Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, in response to the fling of the Senator from New Hampshire at my State for its action in 1928, I frankly admit that my State made a tremendous mistake in 1928, a mistake which it will not soon make again; but, since the Senator from New Hampshire sees fit to make reference to conditions affecting various States, let me remind the Senator from New Hampshire that there now sits in the other end of this Capitol a Member of Congress from New Hampshire, representing, I understand, the district of the Senator himself. The Senator shakes his head; but, at least, the gentleman to whom I refer is from New Hampshire, and is a Democrat. The Senator from New Hampshire, with all his astuteness and his sharp and incisive language, campaigned in New Hampshire not many months ago against the gentleman who now represents the Democratic Party in a district in the State of the Senator from New Hampshire. The Senator from New Hampshire disavows that it is his home district and I readily accept his disavowal; but, at least, the district is in the State which the Senator represents here, and I do not suppose he means to cast any odium upon or evidence any lack of appreciation toward any part of the State which has honored him by a seat in this body.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment, and I will yield.

Let me remind the Senator, however, that that occurrence is some three years later than the action in my own State, and that in that campaign the Republican doctrine fell from the lips of the Senator from New Hampshire himself. He was there in all of his own authority, close to the administration, close to the throne, giving the Republican outlook, praising his candidate for President, telling how the great depression that was created was caused in foreign lands, by the coffee situation in Brazil, and all that sort of stuff. Yet the men in New Hampshire, who know the Senator a great deal better than I know him, did not accept his pronouncements, but turned him and his party down and elected a Democrat from that district—I understand the second time that it has occurred since the War between the States.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I was simply going to remind the Senator from Texas that he ought not to be in a critical mood toward the Senator from New Hampshire, because he contributed to the victory of the Democrat by making speeches against him in that district.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed
Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Schall
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Sheppard
Barkley	Dickinson	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bingham	Dill	Keyes	Smith
Black	Fess	King	Smoot
Blaine	Fletcher	La Follette	Steiwer
Borah	Frazier	Lewis	Stephens
Bratton	George	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Glass	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Glenn	McGill	Townsend
Bulkley	Goldsborough	McNary	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Metcalf	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Morrison	Vandenberg
Capper	Harrison	Moses	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hatfield	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hawes	Norris	Waterman
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Oddie	Wheeler
Costigan	Howell	Patterson	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I rise to discuss a number of the broad questions of policy which underlie the pending so-called anti-injunction bill.

It may be that part of what I shall say has already been said by others and myself on another occasion. The repetition, however, is justified, it seems to me. The RECORD should be complete so that when the courts come to pass upon what we are doing here to-day they may be fully informed of the purposes which moved us and of the ends we desired to accomplish.

It has been charged that the pending bill constitutes special legislation. I admit it. The bill deals not with injunctions generally but with injunctions in labor disputes. Were a lawyer trained in the common law of a century ago to come to life again he would wonder that disputes between employers and employees should be singled out for special treatment. He would be amazed that the injunction should require such detailed regulation. The reason, however, is self-evident to anyone who reads the bill in its proper context as part of the pattern of economic events of the past two generations.

The industrialization of America, the concentration of capital, the development of the labor injunction, the invention of the antiunion promise—out of these special events has arisen the need for this special legislation.

More than 20 years ago Dean Roscoe Pound, of the Harvard Law School, asked the question, "Why is the legal conception of the relation between employer and employee so at variance with the common knowledge of mankind?"

The legal conception was built of a mythical equality between employer and employee, of a mythical freedom of action, of a mythical bargain. The results of the application of that legal conception were, however, far from mythical. It bred injustice, it permitted suffering, it continued the very inequality which the law failed to recognize.

Through the slow processes of legislation we have bit by bit been squaring the legal conception with the common knowledge of mankind. The doctrine of assumption of risk and the fellow-servant rule, for instance, have to a large extent succumbed to modern enlightenment. But the area of concerted action by employees has not yet been won. In spite of numerous attacks, it still flies the flag of a legal conception at variance with the common knowledge of mankind.

As far back as 1887 New York had passed a penal statute which branded as criminal the conduct of an employer who exacted from an employee a promise not to join a union. Many States followed its example. But all these efforts were nullified by the courts, both State and Federal.

We thought we had made a real advance when we passed the Clayton Act, but the hopes which the enactment of that law engendered have been blasted. The adjustment we sought to make thereby has not been made. The friction has continued and intensified. Injunctions are still issued containing restraints which, in the opinion of one Justice of the Supreme Court, remind of involuntary servitude.

Under the blighting effect of the law as it has developed, we have seen the entire coal industry suffer disorder, violence, disintegration. We have seen the Federal courts converted into strike-breaking agencies. We have seen freedom of speech, freedom of association, even the freedom to cooperate in refraining from work, smothered under the blanket of injunctions which now covers the Nation.

What is our problem?

It is far bigger than the mere setting down of rules of practice in certain cases that come before the Federal courts.

Our problem is no less than that of marking out the boundaries of governmental action in the contest and contact between labor and industry.

Three choices are logically open to us:

We might pursue a policy of affirmatively encouraging the organization of labor. That is the policy we expressed when we attempted to pass legislation forbidding the discharge of railroad employees for union membership.

We might affirmatively undertake to repress organized labor. That, in effect, has been the policy the courts have pursued by means of the injunction based upon the antiunion promise.

The third choice is represented by the pending bill. The policy and purpose which give meaning to the present legislation is its implicit declaration that the Government shall occupy a neutral position, lending its extraordinary power neither to those who would have labor unorganized nor to those who would organize it and limiting its action to the preservation of order and the restraint of fraud.

That the need for this legislation still exists reflects no glory upon American jurisprudence. A judiciary accustomed to reexamine the premises of its action in the light of current conditions would never have permitted the injunction through the routine repetition of sterile precedents to grow wild like a tropical jungle. Certainly it is difficult to find justification for enshrining the so-called "yellow-dog" contract among the legal relations which a court of equity would protect.

Regardless of the circumstances under which the antiunion promise is exacted, regardless of the social and economic consequences of its use, the instrument on its face carries the evidence of its invalidity. It is a promise which patently can not be enforced against the employee who makes it. It is an arrangement which imposes no real obligation upon the employer to whom the promise is made.

How extraordinary that upon this meaningless document the courts should have erected a whole system of rights, privileges, and immunities for the employer! He has but to post a notice, "This is a nonunion shop"—as, indeed, one case has held (see Witte, 6 Wis. Law Review, 25)—and, presto, no one may speak approvingly of unionism to any of his employees.

Where else in the law do we find such far-reaching results emanating from so slight a cause? This harks back to the days of legal magic when red wax upon a paper had special potency.

I ask to have inserted at this point of my remarks copies of two letters from attorneys to unions which disclose typical uses to which the antiunion promise is put and request that the names of the writers may be withheld from the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 8, 1926.

To Michael J. Keough, President, and Victor Kleiber, Secretary, and to all of the Officers, Directors, and Members of the International Molders' Union of North America, Edwards Building, 530 Walnut Street, Cincinnati, Ohio; and

To the President, Secretary, and all Officers, Directors, and Members of Local Unions Nos. 31, 244, and 317 of said International Molders' Union of North America, Labor Temple, 274 East High Street, Detroit, Mich.

GENTLEMEN: As attorneys for the Buhl Malleable Co., of Detroit, Mich., and in their behalf and at their request, we are hereby notifying you that the Buhl Malleable Co. has entered into individual contracts with all of their employees employed by them as molders.

The courts of last resort have decided that any interference by unions or officers or members thereof with such private employment contracts and with the men so employed and the business and operation thereof of the employer subjects the guilty parties to damages.

We therefore, in behalf and at the request of our clients, the Buhl Malleable Co., give you due notice and warning to refrain from and desist in any interference with these private employment contracts or the men working thereunder, or in endeavoring in any wise to induce such men to break these private employment contracts, as our clients will promptly, upon such interference, take such legal steps and proceedings as are warranted by law against you and others who interfere directly or indirectly with the performance of these private employment contracts between the Buhl Malleable Co. and their employees as aforestated.

Yours respectfully,

——— ———.

Mr. M. J. KEOUGH,
President International Iron Molders Union of North America, Cincinnati, Ohio

DEAR SIR: We are attorneys for the Elmwood Casting Co., Murray Road, St. Bernard, Ohio, and it has been called to our attention that an effort is being made to persuade and induce the employees of said foundry to become members of the International Iron Molders' Union.

We are also informed that the International Iron Molders' Union of North America, and you, as one of its officers, are engaged in this effort.

The purpose of this letter is to notify you that all of the employees of the Elmwood Casting Co. have accepted employment under written contract and agreement with the company that the shop is being operated and will continue to be operated upon a nonunion basis, and as nonunion, that the employer will not recognize or have any dealing with any labor union; that the employee is not a member of any labor union, and while employed by such company the employee will not become a member of any labor union and will have no dealings, communications, or interviews with the officers, agents, or members of any labor union in relation to membership by the employee in a labor union or in the relation to the employees' employment.

A recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of the Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. has held that an employer who conducts his business on a nonunion basis may legally have a contract with his employees that they are nonunion and will so continue while in his employment, and that the officers and agents of labor unions, having knowledge of such agreement, may be enjoined from soliciting such employees for membership in the union and from interfering with such arrangement. In other words this decision holds that an employer has a right to employ only those who are nonunion and who agree to continue nonunion while in his employment, and the employer is entitled to have union interference with this arrangement enjoined.

If, as has been reported, you have engaged in any way directly or indirectly in endeavoring to persuade the employees of the Elmwood Casting Co. to join a union and thus violate their contract with their employers, you fall within this decision; and unless you discontinue such action, the company will proceed to protect its legal rights as outlined in the case above referred to. We inclose herewith formal notice, duly signed, by the Elmwood Casting Co., notifying you that its employees have agreed in writing as a basis of their employment that they are not members of any labor union, and that during the period of their employment will not become such members, as hereinafter stated.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if we widen the inquiry somewhat and examine the circumstances under which the antiunion promise is exacted we find applicable additional legal principles which deny its validity. Weigh the significance of these facts: To the employee out of work the job means everything—rent, food, and clothing for his wife and children. To the large business organization no worker is indispensable; there is always another to take his place. There is no opportunity for bargaining, there is no possibility of bargaining between parties whose powers are so violently unequal. The employee must either accept the terms of employment as they are tendered or go hungry.

This is not the only situation where the law is presented with the problem of an alleged contract entered into between parties of unequal bargaining power. We find it in cases of lender and borrower, of insurance company and policyholder, of carrier and shipper, of landlord and tenant. In each of these instances the courts never faltered. They either modified or nullified the agreement in the interest of fairness and justice.

The concept which runs through these cases is that a contract is not a legal trick but a bargain, and wherever the facts belie the existence of a bargain equity will not permit the overreaching party to reap the benefit. Upon this ground, too, the antiunion promise should have been denied enforcement.

When we consider the personal implications of the antiunion promise, that the employee undertakes to keep himself defenseless against oppression, powerless to bargain, powerless to withhold his services, without means to improve his condition or to reduce somewhat the frightful insecurity in which he lives, we come to the further conclusion that this promise is what the law calls harsh and unfair and what conscience denounces as wicked and infamous. Such an unholy transaction is not entitled to the protection of equity. (Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Simons, 340.)

Explore this antiunion promise a little further; study the ease with which it is secured; examine its inevitable effect upon the standard of living of all workers; consider that the spread of this device means, first, the collapse of legitimately organized labor; second, a period of peonage when every form of outrageous bondage will be imposed upon the unresisting worker; and, finally, the deadly growth of secret, illegitimate, revolutionary societies existing in defiance of injunctions, mocking both law and order and holding all of American industry under the shadow of its threat.

This prophecy is not fantastic. It is human to associate. Chief Justice Taft has already told us that trade-unions were organized out of the necessities of the situation. Necessities, mind you; and those necessities do not cease to exist or to prod and spur men on to action simply because a judge has issued an injunction.

A device which has consequences as mischievous as these has always been rendered impotent by the courts by declaring its uses against public policy. Why did not the courts apply that principle to the antiunion promise? Charitably we say it was misapprehension of fact. Certainly it was not the compulsion of law which led the courts, with the notable exception of New York, to give effect to the antiunion promise.

Mr. Walter Gordon Merritt is an avowed and well-known opponent of unionism. His views and mine on that subject are as far apart as the poles. His opposition to unionism, however, has not prevented him from condemning the antiunion promise. He has on one occasion said:

To tell a red-blooded citizen he can not join a union while society holds that unions are lawful and useful but whets the desire to join and creates a spirit of sullen hostility which but waits der tag to join the enemies of existing institutions.

Shall employees be thus driven to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage? Can the resourcefulness of radical leadership devise any means better calculated to influence the worker and the public against the employing class? In the name of justice—in the name of public policy—in the name of many more considerations let us have an end of this.

I join heartily in that exhortation. In the name of justice, let us have an end of this. To-day we are engaged in putting an end to it.

Having examined the circumstances under which the antiunion promise is made, having weighed its purpose and measured its personal and social consequences, we declare it to be, as it is, inimical to the welfare of the Nation, and in the exercise of our power to prescribe the jurisdiction of the Federal courts we provide that that promise shall not be enforceable directly or indirectly, legally or equitably. In fact, even the minority of the committee joins in the condemnation of the antiunion promise as against public policy. They so declare it in the amendment the Senator from Rhode Island has submitted. Strangely enough, they would withhold only equitable relief. Why such timidity? Why such inconsistency? What logic is there in the distinction the minority would draw? Would the Senator from Rhode Island wish to see the courts apply legal remedies for the enforcement of arrangement which he himself brands as hostile to the Nation's welfare?

I do not at this time desire to enter into a discussion of the several amendments offered by the minority. There is one, however, which is so far-reaching in its effect that if adopted it would destroy whatever concession has been made by the minority and completely cripple the effectiveness of the bill. It is for that reason that I mention it now.

The amendment to which I have reference is the one addressed to the definitions. It reads as follows:

(b) The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy arising between employer or employee or employers or employees concerning wages, hours of labor, or the conditions under which labor shall be employed, or any other controversy arising out of the respective interests of the employer and employee.

The significant and all-important change is the omission of these words which are in the original bill, "regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee."

What the minority has done has been to adopt the definition almost verbatim from section 20 of the Clayton Act, which has been held by the Supreme Court in the Duplex case (254 U. S. 443) to apply only to an employer and his employees. Should this amendment carry, we shall find the legitimate effort of unions to extend their organizations again frustrated. It would undo a large share of the work we are to-day trying to accomplish.

The principal issue raised by the minority is not on the merits of the public policy declared by the bill. It is concerned with legislative power. I quote from the minority report:

In our opinion this form of agreement deprives employees of the right of free association with their fellows and takes away from them the opportunity to deal on a basis of equality with those by whom they are employed. But, however distasteful they may be to us and however much we may sympathize with those who believe that the interests of employees will never be properly protected except through legislative enactment, the fact remains that the Supreme Court in three cases has held that there is no legislative power, State or Federal, to inhibit or outlaw employment contracts providing against union membership. (Coppage v. Kansas (1915), 236 U. S. 1; Adair v. United States (1908), 208 U. S. 161; Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell (1917), 245 U. S. 229.)

To provide by legislation that the courts shall not protect this right is unquestionably a deprivation of property without due process of law. It seems too clear for argument that if the right to make such contracts is constitutionally protected that this constitutional protection can not be destroyed by directing the courts to treat such contracts as a nullity.

Before considering the cases cited by the minority it is well to advert to its constitutional reference.

"If the right to make such contracts is constitutionally protected," says the minority, "this constitutional protection can not be destroyed by directing the courts to treat such contracts as a nullity."

That, of course, begs the question. The word "contract" implies a binding agreement. If we assume that the power to make such agreements binding is protected by the Constitution, of course, we are powerless to act. But in order to make that assumption we must believe that the organic law of this Nation confers unchangeable protection upon a trick device conceived in unfairness, condemned as immoral, denounced as uneconomic, and recognized by both majority and minority to be destructive of the opportunity for equal dealing between employer and employee. I do not believe that the fifth amendment embalms forever in our law what is socially reprehensible.

What, then, of the Supreme Court cases cited by the minority. The first of these is Adair against United States, decided in 1908. The facts of that case have been mentioned too often in the course of this debate to require restatement by me. I make bold to suggest, however, that its vital difference has not yet been mentioned. The significant factor is that the statute in the Adair case attempted to limit the power of the employer to discharge an employee.

The power to fire without cause and to quit without reason was part and parcel of the employment arrangement subsisting between the employer and employee. The statute attempted in effect to write a clause into their understanding, namely, that the employer shall not fire for union activity. It was an act of direct intervention by the Government into the employment relationship. It was that which the court refused to sustain.

The Coppage case, decided in 1915, followed the same line of reasoning. The employer was free to refuse employment for any cause or no cause. A State statute attempted, in the judgment of a majority of the Supreme Court, to limit this freedom of the employer. In effect the statute was directing the employer to hire certain employees against his will. That, too, represented a direct and affirmative intervention by the Government into the employment relation which the court refused to permit.

By the bill which is before us we do none of the acts condemned by the court. We do not limit the untrammeled power of the employer to dismiss whom he pleases. We do not direct the employer whom he shall hire. We do announce that the Federal courts will no longer help him or hinder him in the pursuit of a nonunion policy. No longer shall the execution of an antiunion promise sound the triple alarm to bring to the scene every weapon in the arsenal of equity. The distinction which I draw is by no means novel to the law. There are numerous instances where the law permits the exaction of a promise to go unpunished but refuses to enforce the promise when made.

An employer may refuse to hire a worker unless he promises to remain unmarried. But the promise will not be enforced.

A manufacturer may refuse to sell goods to a dealer who cuts the resale price (U. S. v. Colgate, 250 U. S. 300), but the promise of the dealer not to cut the price is unenforceable. (Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons, 220 U. S. 373.)

The Hitchman case remains to be considered. In one sense it need not be. Already the Supreme Court has itself circumscribed the meaning of that case. In the case of American Foundries v. Tri-Cities Trades Council (257 U. S. 184) Chief Justice Taft justified the Hitchman decision on the fraudulent and deceitful means which were present in that case. But that is by no means the only reason why the Hitchman decision is not relevant to the present issue. When the Hitchman case was decided there had as yet been no legislative declaration of public policy. That is the new factor which this bill provides. Indeed, the major evils of the antiunion promise were born after the Hitchman case. Until the antiunion promise became the source of injunctions it was a fang without venom.

The Hitchman case does not hold that Congress has not the power to declare the contract involved in that case against public policy. The most we can say is that the court did not so find it. But the making of public policy is preeminently a legislative function, and that function we are to-day exercising.

One additional argument against the underlying policy of this bill has been employed by the opposition. I quote from a brief submitted by the National Coal Association:

Liberty of individual contract may not, under the Constitution of the United States, be limited or abridged in any way whatsoever.

"Liberty of contract"! What a noble phrase. What an ignoble purpose it is made to serve.

Is there any truth in the assertion I have quoted? Let us test it by our common experience. Has any one of us the liberty to make an enforceable contract to pay a rate of interest beyond that fixed by statute? Has any one of us the liberty to enter into a contract with a railroad to ship our merchandise at a rate other than that fixed by statute and regulations?

Has any one of us the liberty to enter into a contract to exempt a carrier from liability for negligence? Has any one of us the liberty to make an enforceable contract not to compete with the purchaser of his business in an excessive area or for an indefinite period? Has anyone the power to make an enforceable resale-price agreement? (Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons (220 U. S. 373).)

When we examine the law governing the relationship between employer and employee we find no such liberty of contract as special pleaders presume to assert.

A worker's contract not to compete with his employer for an unreasonable period after the termination of the employment is not enforceable. (Clark Paper Manufacturing Co. v. Stenacher (236 N. Y. 312); Menter Co. v. Brock (147 Minn. 407).)

Even without the aid of statute it has been held that the agreement of a workman that his wages should be nonassignable is unenforceable. (Aldridge Lumber Co. v. Graves (131 S. W. 848); Berwick Lumber Co. v. Hall (94 Ga. 539).)

Valid statutes have prevented employees from bartering away in advance their right to collect from employers for injuries sustained. Valid statutes have prevented employees from effectively promising to work in a mine more than a stated number of hours. (Utah; Holder v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366.)

Why, then, have we not the power to say that the Federal courts shall not enforce agreements exacted from a workman not to join with his fellow men to increase his bargaining power, to increase his earnings, to insure himself against unemployment, and to diminish somewhat the degree of insecurity in which he lives?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to make just one observation and ask one question. I am very much convinced that the Senator's argument is correct. As I understand it, we have the right under the substantive law to provide that such contracts may not be enforced in court. I do not for a moment concede that it might be held that such a contract could lawfully be made. Of course, we could not prevent the making of such a contract. But even though it were to be so held, there would not be anything to prevent Congress taking away from the Federal court the jurisdiction to enforce such a contract by injunction, would there?

Mr. WAGNER. There would not. The contention I make is, of course, that, the contract being against public policy, it should not be enforced either in a court of equity or a court of law.

Mr. LONG. I agree with that.

Mr. WAGNER. In Frisbie v. United States (157 U. S. 160) the Supreme Court considered the validity of a statute which imposed a penalty upon an attorney who contracted to receive more than $10 for representing a claimant in a pension case. It was, of course, objected that the statute was unconstitutional as interfering with the liberty of contract. Said the court:

> This objection is untenable. While it may be conceded that, generally speaking, among the inalienable rights of the citizen is that of the liberty of contract, yet such liberty is not absolute and universal. It is within the undoubted power of government to restrain some individuals from all contracts as well as all individuals from some contracts.

The court proceeded to mention contracts for the sale of lottery tickets, contracts by minors, contracts by carriers to exempt them from negligence, and stated that the Government—> may restrain all engaged in any employment from any contract in the course of that employment which is against public policy.

In Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S. 366) the question presented to the Supreme Court involved the validity of a Utah statute prescribing an 8-hour law for persons working in the mines. The statute was attacked as unconstitutional, in contravention of the fourteenth amendment, in that it deprived the defendant of the right to make the contract in a lawful way for a lawful purpose. But the court sustained the statute. It said:

> The fact that both parties are of full age and competent to contract does not necessarily deprive the State of the power to interfere where the parties do not stand upon an equality.

I should like to repeat, Mr. President, the closing words of that quotation, "where the parties do not stand upon an equality."

In his matchless style, Mr. Justice Holmes has once said:

> The fourteenth amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's social statics.

Indeed, the whole Constitution will lose its vitality, its extraordinary capacity to guide a people in a changing world, once we subscribe to the fiction that it has codified the individualistic theories of the laissez faire economists.

The Supreme Court has cautioned us against that danger. It has declared, "The very reverse of that which is the policy of the public at one time may become public policy at another." (Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. Chicago, 175 U. S. 91.)

What does the public policy of the twentieth century demand in industrial relations? It was not so long ago when the business of earning a livelihood was an independent undertaking. The worker owned his shop, his tools, and the good will of his customers. To-day a large and ever-increasing proportion of our people must earn their living through wages. The average workman owns no tools of production but his hands and his skill.

At the same time capital has become a cooperative venture, and through the pooling of many resources, great aggregates of wealth have assembled gigantic engines of production which control the opportunities for employment.

If into this condition of affairs we should inject the archaic notions of master and servant, what kind of citizenship will inhabit this continent in the next generation? Can we expect anything else to follow from such a course but that we shall raise a nation of drawers of water and hewers of wood, to pass their days in toil and their nights in fear in order to support a fortunate few in oriental elegance?

Every ancient civilization that has tried that experiment to-day lies in the dust and serves no purpose but to quench the curiosity of the historian and archæologist. There is no need for us to repeat this ancient folly. We can raise a race of men who are economically as well as politically free. By permitting labor to organize freely and effectively we can convert the relation of master and servant into an equal and cooperative partnership, shouldering alike the responsibilities of management and sharing alike in the rewards of increasing production.

To me the organization of labor holds forth far greater possibilities than shorter hours and better wages. Organization plants in the heart of every worker a sense of power and individuality, a feeling of freedom and security, which are the characteristics of the kind of men Divine Providence intended us to be.

Simple justice commands that we unfetter the worker in his effort to achieve his goal. Statesmanship dictates that we encourage him to take this road of organized action to responsibility, to self-mastery, to human liberty, and to national greatness.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a layman's nontechnical, informative discussion of the abuse of injunctions, written by Mr. Richard W. Hogue, who is associated with the People's Legislative Service of Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. Hogue's statement is as follows:

THE ABUSE OF INJUNCTIONS

It is important that public opinion should be informed regarding the nature and evils of the injunction menace. The general public is widely unaware of these evils. For the most part it is ignorant of what the injunction is, how it is used, and why it is now a major issue before Congress. We propose to throw such light on the subject as limited space permits.

Our judicial system was derived from that of England. That system provided courts of chancery or equity, for handling a prescribed class of cases. These courts began to encroach on the regular courts of law. A prolonged conflict ensued which resulted in the establishment of basic rules governing all courts of equity.

These long-established rules are fundamental to the law and of far-reaching importance to the public. They provide that equity courts exist solely for the benefit of the aggrieved and not the aggressor and are limited to the protection of property from irreparable injury when there is no adequate remedy at law, that they must not interfere with personal rights and that those who seek equity must do equity—must come into court with clean hands. In America these basic rules have frequently been set aside through injunctions issued by Federal judges sitting in equity.

What is an injunction? It is a court writ (issued without a jury hearing) "commanding an act which the court regards as essential to justice or restraining an act which it deems contrary to equity and good conscience." The danger of placing such power at the disposal of the limited or prejudiced judgment of a single judge is obvious. The extent to which this power has been misused has been shocking. Its most flagrant abuse so far has been directed against industrial workers. If not checked it may be used to crush farmers as well, and to extend the control of great corporate interests over the rights and liberties of individuals and groups.

Beginning in 1880, the abuse of this power steadily increased in the United States. It had become so serious by 1893 that an injunction issued in that year was denounced in the report of a congressional committee as "a surprising exercise of the processes of" the "court to abuse the judicial power," "an invasion of the rights of American citizens," and "contrary to the genius and freedom of American institutions."

This injunction and later ones took away the right of trial by jury, destroyed the worker's power of organized self-defense, revealed the extent to which courts were controlled by special interests, substituted property rights for human rights, and threatened to supplant government by law with the arbitrary fiat of a single judge. These evils increased with the efforts of manufacturers to kill the growing labor movement. Organized labor appealed to Congress. The result was the drawing up of the Clayton Act, of which an eminent jurist declared: "If this bill is passed, labor will not need any more legislation for 100 years." The bill was approved by the Judiciary Commitees of both Houses and was passed in 1914.

Section 20 of this act contains these important provisions:

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, persuading others by peaceful means to do so.

"Or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working.

"Or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means to do so.

"Or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such disputes, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value.

"Or from peacefully assembling in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes.

"Or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

"Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States."

It was not long before each of these plain provisions of the law was violated by powerful corporations. The means to this end was at hand. It was the usual recourse of the vested interests—reliance on the property-minded partisans, who constituted a majority of the United States Supreme Court. In the face of dissenting opinions by the minority members, representing its highest character and ability, that court rendered successive decisions which nullified practically every right which the Clayton Act sought to safeguard.

These decisions opened the way for an avalanche of oppressive injunctions. Their total effect has been to undermine constitutional rights and civil liberties. They have forced workers into involuntary servitude to their employers. They have justified coercion, oppression, and brutality. They have elevated assumed property rights above established human rights. They have substituted the prejudiced opinions of equity judges for the orderly processes of courts of law. They have helped the prosperous to starve the poor and enabled the powerful to crush the weak. They have intensified class hatred and encouraged contempt for the courts.

Such serious charges require strong proof. The proof is irrefutable and abundant. It is a matter of record in public documents. We shall cite enough of it to show why the injunction menace is now a major issue before Congress.

II

The information to follow is taken from three outstanding sources: Court records, the published hearings before a Senate committee, and the comprehensive treatment of the subject by Professors Frankfurter and Greene of Harvard. The cases here cited are not isolated or rare. The great preponderance of injunctions in labor disputes are directed against the workers.

A theater discharged all union employees. Their employer secured an injunction which upheld the employer's claim that the peaceful protests of workers and the press constituted "a conspiracy," and that public patronage was a "property right." It prohibited a local paper from expressing its opinion of the issue and enjoined the discharged workers from placing their case before the public in any way. People were sentenced to prison for defying this arbitrary decision. The injunction was a denial of the right of peaceful public protest, of freedom of the press, and of a community's access to both sides of a local controversy.

In the same State an antiunion group of employers conspired to force a firm to quit employing union labor. They declared a boycott against this firm and agreed not to furnish supplies or do business with it. An injunction against the conspiracy was applied for. By refusing to issue the injunction, the court supported the conspiracy to put the firm and its union employees out of business.

Time and again the established right of workers to organize has been prohibited by court injunctions secured by antiunion employers. Many such injunctions have taken this right from labor and handed it over to hostile employers. This has been done by forbidding all efforts to organize "without plaintiff's consent"—meaning the employer's.

A favorite device for dominating the workers is the well-known company-controlled union. Equity courts have strengthened this domination by enjoining organized labor from even "advising" or "requesting" any employee to become a member of any union or association except the "company union." In addition to this denial of freedom to form voluntary associations, the workers are denied access to information and advice that might better their condition. Equity courts have thus sustained industrial feudalism and economic slavery. They have gone even further in this direction.

Employers have forged the "yellow-dog contract" as a coercive weapon against employees. By that contract the worker is forced to sign away his right to join a labor union where he is then employed, regardless of whatever may develop in his own needs or the conditions of his work. Often, with no other means of livelihood before him, he must sign or see his family starve. In sustaining this form of duress the courts have forced thousands of workers into what is virtually a state of involuntary servitude.

Equity judges have often denied men the recognized right to quit work in a lawful manner. The Supreme Court has done this even after the lower courts have refused. An injunction forcing men back into the service of former employers was denied by the equity court. The United States Court of Appeals upheld the decision. The Supreme Court overruled both and issued the injunction. In the able dissenting opinion of the minority (including Justice Holmes) Justice Brandeis declared: "If, on the undisputed facts of this case, refusal to work can be enjoined, Congress created by the Sherman law and the Clayton Act an instrument for imposing restraints upon labor which reminds of involuntary servitude."

Injunctions based on Supreme Court decisions have not only forced men, against their will, to work for certain employers, but have prohibited them from "publishing, circulating, or otherwise communicating, either directly or indirectly, in writing or orally, to each other or to any other person, any statement or notice of any kind or character whatsoever, intimating or suggesting that the complainants [employers] are, or were, or have been unfair."

Through injunctions employees have been ordered to resign from their unions or lose their jobs; unions have been forbidden to assist their own members financially, to furnish appeal bonds or employ attorneys; workers have not been allowed to discuss their grievances among themselves or with neighbors. Men have been held as property, denied the testimony of witnesses, and deprived of the right of trial by jury. Plainly, this is judicial tyranny. It sanctions and enforces the oppression of one class by another, destroys human rights, and undermines democracy.

In the last 10 years the number of injunctions has increased alarmingly. Nearly 300 were issued in 1 industrial dispute, the shopmen's strike of 1922. A single injunction granted at the combined request of over 60 coal operators paralyzed the efforts of an organization numbering over a quarter of a million workers. The wide extent to which the use of injunctions has spread is beyond dispute. What is the explanation of this condition? What are the proposed remedies for it?

III

There is a very definite explanation of the conditions we have described. One of the major factors in the situation is found in the chief purpose for which injunctions are sought by the owning and employing class. As stated by Justice Brandeis, that purpose is "not to prevent property from being injured nor to protect the owner in its use, but to endow property with active, militant power which would make it dominant over men." In the ablest recent volume on the subject, Professor Frankfurter, of Harvard, established the fact that the injunction, to use his own words, "employs the most powerful resources of the law on one side of a bitter social struggle." The conclusions of Justice Brandeis and Doctor Frankfurter are amply sustained by the evidence.

With notable exceptions, the owners of wealth and property, the possessors of privilege and power, desire complete and absolute control over the jobs, the wages, and the working conditions of their employees. Not content with the power of possession and the dominant privileges that it conveys (personal, political, and social), they seek to obtain uncontested control over the largest body of producers, the working class. Organized and concerted action constitutes the workers' chief weapon of effective self-defense.

To deprive the working class of this weapon, the injunction is used with deadly effect. Even when it is not called into force, the odds are all against the workers. When it is exercised in behalf of employers, it completely paralyzes the employees' power of concerted action. With this purpose, the employing class is resorting to the use of the injunction with a frequency that has increased in direct ratio to the increased efforts of the workers to strengthen their power of collective bargaining through trade-union organization.

The primary cause of the injunction menace is the motive of self-interest that by and large dominates the business and industrial world. From this motive there emerges the greed of possession, profit, and power that produces conflict and breeds strife. While this continues, industry will be marked by the intermittent warfare of conflicting interests. While it lasts, constructive and peaceful industrial progress will be retarded and the might of the strong will prevail over the rights of the weak.

The injunction menace is a vicious consequence of class selfishness. There is no hope of a prompt cure for the social disease that produces it. But the need of immediate legislation to correct its worst evils is imperative. Limited space allows but a brief outline of certain proposals that have been made.

I. Rejection by the Senate of appointees to the United States Supreme Court with a bad record of injunctions—as in the Parker case.

II. Curtailing the practice of usurpation of legislative powers by the judiciary—as, for instance, in the Supreme Court's "interpretation" of the child labor laws and the Clayton Act.

III. Directing the power of the ballot against candidates (especially presidential and congressional) whose affiliations and records show them to be subservient to special privilege.

IV. Special legislation by Congress. The following are among the proposals made at the hearings on injunctions before a special subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee. The bill that comes from that committee will be pressed for action before this session of Congress. It is obvious that some of these proposals are in conflict with others. We list them here solely for the information of our readers:

1. Forbid injunctions in the field of labor disputes.

2. Limit number of acts that can be enjoined and exempt civil and constitutional rights—such as freedom of speech, assemblage, and press.

3. In labor disputes invoking the law, confine equity courts to their original limited scope, thus compelling parties to many such disputes to settle by mediation or before the regular courts of law—civil and criminal.

4. Require testimony on both sides before a judge can issue a restraining order or temporary injunction which may—and often does—defeat the workers before the question of a permanent injunction is brought to a hearing.

5. Make provision for trial of important cases before three judges instead of one.

6. Provide that hearings on permanent injunction be tried speedily after restraining order has been granted.

7. Compel prompt hearings on cases appealed.

8. In cases of contempt of court for alleged violation of restraining order or injunction, provide that trial may be held before some other court than the one against which the contempt is alleged.

9. Outlaw "yellow-dog" contract.

10. Restore legal safeguards such as right of trial by jury, cross-examination of witnesses, etc.

11. Define "property" so as not to include persons or abstract and intangible things.

The imperative need of legislation has been recognized by eminent jurists, economists, and men in high public office, including former Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson. Both major parties have been forced to make public pronouncements on the subject in their campaign platforms. These few out of many similar passages from the volume of Professors Frankfurter and Greene reveal a particularly serious aspect of the injunction menace:

"As to labor controversies during the last quarter century, equity in America has absorbed the law."

"The extraordinary remedy of injunction has become the ordinary legal remedy, almost the sole remedy. * * * The injunction is America's distinctive contribution in the application of law to industrial strife."

"The judge determines the facts without a jury; the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury does not extend to suits in equity. Proceedings in contempt of the injunction are heard before the judge who granted the decree, again without a jury to pass on the evidence, frequently upon affidavits in lieu of testimony subjected to cross-examination."

STRENGTHENING OF PROCEDURE IN THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM (H. DOC. NO. 262)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On previous occasions I have called the attention of the Congress to the necessity of strengthening and making certain changes in our judicial and law-enforcement machinery. Since then substantial progress has been made both through improved methods of administration and additional legislation. However, there is room for further improvement. With this in mind, in my annual message on the state of the Union I stated that I would address the Congress at a later date on important matters of reform in organization and procedure of criminal law enforcement and the practices of the Federal courts. The subjects are of highly technical character. They have been exhaustively examined by the Department of Justice, the Commission on Law Enforcement, and recommendations have been made over many years by various bar associations of the country.

CONGESTION IN THE COURTS

Improvement has been shown during the past three years through steps taken under direction of the Attorney General in more efficient organization of enforcement agencies through congressional action in concentration of the responsibilities in the Department of Justice and through the prison reform laws passed by the Congress. Yet despite every effort there is still undue congestion in the courts in a number of districts.

The following statistics indicate this congestion as well as the progress made.

In private litigation in the Federal courts in the last five years there has been no large increase in the number of cases commenced, but the courts have not been able to reduce the number of such cases pending and awaiting trial.

The number of Government civil cases begun in 1928 was 20,695, increasing each year until in 1931 the total was 25,332. Cases terminated during this period show that the judicial department has kept pace with the increase but has been unable to reduce the congestion.

The number of bankruptcy cases begun has increased from 53,000 in 1928 to 65,000 in 1931, with a steady increase in the number of cases undisposed of at the end of each year.

Criminal cases commenced have increased from 1928 to 1931, but the number pending shows a decrease from 30,400 at the end of 1928 to 27,900 at the end of 1931. In 1931 alone 4,000 more criminal cases were disposed of than commenced, showing a definite gain in this field. There has also been a steady improvement in the quality of the work of the prosecuting agencies. Despite an increase in the volume of criminal cases begun, there has been a steady reduction in the number left pending each year. The results attained show a greater percentage of convictions and a lower ratio of dismissals and acquittals. In 1928, 78.3 per cent of criminal cases terminated were by verdict and plea of guilty, while in 1931 this ratio had increased to 84.2 per cent. In 1928, 21.7 per cent of criminal cases were terminated by dismissal or acquittal, while in 1931 this figure had fallen to 15.8 per cent.

Final results of the more effective work of the Federal agencies for enforcement of criminal laws are evidenced by increase of prisoners. The number of Federal convicts in prison institutions and on parole increased from 19,110 at the end of 1928 to 27,871 on June 30, 1931. During the same period the number on probation increased from 3,500 to 12,000. The total number of Federal convicts under some form of restraint was 39,900 on June 30, 1931, as compared with 22,600 on June 30, 1928. The recent reorganization of the parole and probation systems not only has produced a humane result but has relieved an otherwise impossible prison congestion. These gains in effectiveness have been the result mainly of improvement in personnel, of administrative effort and reorganization, and not of reforms in judicial procedure.

I commend to the attention of the Congress the recommendations of the Judicial Conference on the subject of increased personnel. Relief should be granted in those districts where private litigants are suffering from delay, where civil and criminal dockets are seriously congested, and additional judges are needed.

REFORM IN CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

The extent of crime is and must be a subject of increasing concern to the Government and to every well-disposed citizen. This increase is by no means confined to the violation of new criminal laws.

Some part of all crime is due to confidence of criminals in the delays of the law and to their ability to avoid conviction and to delay penalties by misuse of the procedure and provisions of the law intended to assure fair trial. This is more manifest in procedure in the courts of some States than in the Federal courts. Yet important reforms in the Federal establishment and in the Federal procedure are needed and must be undertaken. Aside from its direct result, the indirect result of high standards in the Federal courts is of nation-wide influence.

CRIMINAL APPEALS

The present procedure in criminal appeals to the United States circuit courts of appeals and the procedure in the United States district courts, in preparation for appeals after verdicts of guilty, lend themselves to delay and unnecessary expense. With the granting of bail and the stay of execution of the sentence, the convicted person loses all incentive to expedite his appeal. No small part of the general criticism of the delay in criminal cases rises from the delays in the preparation and hearing of appeals after verdicts of guilty, and a reform in these particulars would be a long step in advance.

Respect for the law and the effect of convictions as a deterrent to crime are diminished if convicted persons are observed by their fellow citizens to be at large for long periods pending appeal. All steps subsequent to verdicts of guilty are involved in these processes. A statutory code of procedure on this subject would not be sufficiently flexible. I suggest that the Supreme Court of the United States be authorized to prescribe uniform rules of practice and procedure in criminal cases for all proceedings after verdicts in the district courts, and for the circuit courts of appeals, including the courts of the District of Columbia. The success of the Supreme Court in the prompt disposition of criminal cases brought before it gives confidence that it will deal effectively with this subject. The objection heretofore advanced to authorizing the Supreme Court to establish uniform rules of procedure in civil cases, that such rules would destroy the conformity between practice in State and Federal courts, has no validity against the proposal for uniform procedure in criminal cases, in which no conformity exists.

WAIVER OF INDICTMENTS

Legislation should be enacted to permit an accused person to waive the requirement of indictment by grand jury. Where the accused admits his guilt, preliminary hearings and grand-jury proceedings are not necessary for his protection; they cause unnecessary expense and delay. In such cases the law should permit immediate plea and sentence upon the filing of an information. That would allow the accused to begin immediate service of his sentence without languishing in jail to await action of a grand jury, and would reduce the expense of maintenance of prisoners, lessen the work of prosecutors, and tend to speed up disposition of criminal cases.

INVALIDITY OF INDICTMENTS THROUGH THE DISQUALIFICATION OF GRAND JURORS

There have been many instances, some recently in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, where indictments, returned after long and expensive hearings, have been invalidated by the discovery of the presence on the grand jury of a single ineligible juror. By law applicable to the United States district courts, including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, it should be provided that if not less than 12 eligible grand jurors vote for an indictment, it shall not be invalidated because of the presence of ineligible jurors. Legislation should be enacted limiting the time for making motions to quash indictments because of disqualifications of grand jurors.

All the foregoing proposals relating to criminal procedure should be made applicable to the Supreme Court of the District. In addition, the statutes in force in the District respecting the qualifications of grand and petit jurymen and their selection should be thoroughly examined and overhauled. Grounds of ineligibility now exist which do not affect the availability or impartiality of jurymen.

The system now in operation in the District for preparing lists of persons qualified for jury service requires improvement.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Each year many juveniles charged with violation of law fall into the custody of the Federal authorities. In the interest of child welfare there should be legislation enabling the Attorney General to forego prosecution of children in the Federal courts and to return them to State authorities to be dealt with by juvenile courts and other State agencies equipped to deal with juvenile delinquents.

JURISDICTION BASED ON DIVERSITY OF CITIZENSHIP

The Constitution provides that the judicial power of the Federal courts shall extend to cases between citizens of different States and the judiciary acts have provided for the exercise of this jurisdiction. In its application, the courts have determined that a corporation shall be deemed a citizen of the State under whose law it is organized. Cases involving corporations, with jurisdiction based on diversity of citizenship, form a substantial part of the business of the Federal courts. Legislation heretofore has been proposed to abolish entirely the jurisdiction of the Federal courts based on diversity of citizenship. I do not approve of such a measure.

The reasons which induced the constitutional grant to the Federal courts of jurisdiction over cases between citizens of different States still exist. To abolish that jurisdiction entirely would work to the detriment of those States which look to outside capital for the development of their business and commerce. As applied to special types of cases, however, affecting corporations, the present law allows the Federal courts to exercise jurisdiction because of diversity of citizenship, in cases not within the real purpose and spirit of the constitutional provision referred to.

I recommend the consideration by the Congress of a measure to modify this jurisdiction to a limited extent by providing that where a corporation, organized under the laws of one State, carries on business in another State it shall be treated as a citizen of the State wherein it carries on business as respects suits brought within that State between it and the residents thereof and arising out of the business carried on in such State. Such a change in the law would keep out of the Federal courts cases which do not really belong there and reduce the burdens of the Federal courts without impairing in any degree the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction which the framers of the Constitution had in mind.

PROHIBITION LAW IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

I have hitherto recommended legislation effectively to supplement the prohibition law for the District of Columbia. The Attorney General has made recommendations as to the character of such legislation before the committees of the Congress. I again urge favorable action.

BANKRUPTCY

The Federal Government is charged under the Constitution with the responsibility of providing the country with an adequate system for the administration of bankrupt estates.. The importance of such a system to the business life of the community is apparent. The number of cases in bankruptcy has steadily increased from 23,000 in the fiscal year 1921 to 53,000 in 1928 and to 65,000 in 1931. The liabilities involved have increased from $171,000,000 in 1921 to $830,000,000 in 1928 and $1,008,000,000 in 1931, and the losses to creditors have increased from $144,000,000 in 1921 to $740,000,000 in 1928 and to $911,000,000 in 1931. The increases are, therefore, obviously not due to the economic situation, but to deeper causes.

A sound bankruptcy system should operate—

First, to relieve honest but unfortunate debtors of an overwhelming burden of debt;

Second, to effect a prompt and economical liquidation and distribution of insolvent estates; and Third, to discourage fraud and needless waste of assets by withholding relief from debtors in proper cases.

For some time the prevailing opinion has been that our present bankruptcy act has failed in its purpose and needs thorough revision. During the past year the Department of Justice, with my approval, has conducted an investigation into the administration of bankrupt estates in the Federal courts. Nation-wide in its scope, the inquiry has involved intensive study of the practical operation of the bankruptcy act under varying local conditions throughout the United States. Court records and special reports of referees have been analyzed. Organizations of business men and lawyers have assisted in gathering information not available through official channels. Judges, prosecuting officers, referees, merchants, bankers, and others have made available their experience. Data gathered by the Department of Commerce relating to causes of failure and the effect of bad debts upon business has been studied. The history of bankruptcy legislation and administration in this country, and in Great Britain, Canada, and other countries, has been reviewed.

The inquiry has now been completed. Its result is embodied in a report which is transmitted herewith for the consideration of the Congress. Thorough and exhaustive in detail, it presents the information necessary to enable the Congress to determine the faults in the present law and to devise their cure.

The present bankruptcy act is defective in that it holds out every inducement for waste of assets long after business failure has become inevitable. It permits exploitation of its own process and wasteful administration by those who are neither truly representative of the creditor nor the bankrupt.

Except in rare cases it results in the grant of a full discharge of all debts without sufficient inquiry as to the conduct of the bankrupt or of the causes of failure. It discharges from their debts large numbers of persons who might have paid without hardship had the law discriminated between those overwhelmed by misfortune and those needing only temporary relief and the opportunity to deal fairly with their creditors.

The bankruptcy act should be amended to provide remedial processes in voluntary proceedings under which debtors, unable to pay their debts in due course, may have the protection of the court without being adjudged bankrupt, for the purpose of composing or extending the maturity of their debts, of amortizing the payment of their debts out of future earnings, of procuring the liquidation of their property under voluntary assignment to a trustee; or, in the case of corporations, for the purpose of reorganization.

The act should be amended to require the examination of every bankrupt by a responsible official and a full disclosure of the cause of his failure and of his conduct in connection therewith for the consideration of the court in determining whether he should have his discharge.

The discretion of the courts in granting or refusing discharges should be broadened, and they should be authorized to postpone discharges for a time and require bankrupts, during the period of suspension, to make some satisfaction out of after-acquired property as a condition to the granting of a full discharge.

The choice of the liquidating personnel should be limited to competent individuals or organizations after careful consideration by the courts of their qualifications and ability to maintain an efficient and permanent staff for the conduct of the business. Compensation for such services should be upon a scale which will attract trained business organizations. Competent officials should be continuously charged with the observance of the administration of the law and with the duty to suggest to the courts and to Congress methods for its improvement. The present statute is susceptible of improvement to eliminate delay in its cumbersome processes, much of which results from a confusion of judicial and business functions.

The inquiry has not stopped with the collection of information and an expression of general conclusions. Its results have been embodied by the Attorney General in a bill for revision of the present bankruptcy act in order to present the proposals in concrete form.

I earnestly commend them to your consideration.

CONCLUSIONS

Reform in judicial procedure is, for many reasons, a slow process. It is not to be brought about by any single measure. It can best be accomplished by dealing with the subject step by step, the sum of which, in the course of time, will result in definite improvement. Taken together, the proposals above outlined offer an opportunity for substantial improvement in the administration of justice. They tend to decrease the burden on the Public Treasury and upon litigants. None of them requires consequential increase in expenditures. They would reduce crime.

In concluding, may I not say that important as these recommendations are we must all keep before us the thought that effective administration of the law in a republic requires not only adequate and proper machinery, honest and capable officials, but above all a citizenry imbued with a spirit of respect for law.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 29, 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message of the President, with the accompanying report of the Attorney General, will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the message printed.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, concerning the report of the Attorney General on the bankruptcy act and its administration in the courts of the United States, I think all of us are agreed as to the importance of the subject of bankruptcy to the business of the country generally. It has been discussed in, I should say, the bar associations of all the States. It is a subject which has been before the American Bar Association for a long time, and one which has received the most earnest consideration of the members of that body.

The report of the Attorney General which comes to us this morning I think should be available to the Senate; and I ask that it may be printed as a public document in connection with the message of the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RADIO ADDRESS BY JOHN A. SIMPSON, PRESIDENT NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and interesting radio address made by John A. Simpson, President of the National Farmers' Union, over a nation-wide broadcasting hook-up on Saturday, February 27, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow stockholders in the largest corporation in the world, the United States of America, I am happy indeed to greet you again and to have this opportunity, furnished by the National Broadcasting Co., to report to you concerning the doings of the board of directors that you have placed here in the National Capital in charge of this great corporation.

I talked to you at this hour four weeks ago, and I thank you for your wonderful response. You may be glad to know that I received more than 18,000 letters asking for copies of that talk. Not more than half of those that wrote are farmers. At least one-half are made up of all kinds and classes of people. Among those writing were preachers, priests, teachers, students, merchants, bankers, every kind of business man and laborer.

The response was so much greater than I had anticipated that expenses reached such a sum that it requires regulation in order for me to tell you that I can furnish a copy of this talk to all who make requests. For two weeks I had five girls doing nothing but opening letters and reading them. I desire to eliminate that expense by asking anyone who desires a copy to use a postcard. Let me also ask that you write your name and address very plainly—printing it is the best method.

Out of the letters received from the talk in January quite a number asked for copies and did not sign their names at all. They are now wondering why they did not receive one. Out of more than 18,000 letters received, only seven criticized my talk. We had 30,000 copies printed, and Congressmen and Senators received so many requests for copies that Senator ELMER THOMAS placed the speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He had 20,000 copies printed and sent out at his own private expense. You must know that the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America is strictly a farmers' organization, whose only source of revenue to the national organization is 25 cents per year dues from each member. We are poor financially but rich in principle, in faith, and in courage.

I am also glad to report to you that there never was such an avalanche of letters received by Congressmen and Senators as the result of one broadcasting talk. But it is only a drop in the bucket to what must be done to awaken the sleeping giant, Congress. Congress is the most powerful branch of our National Government. Yet the very bureaus, commissions, and departments that it creates tell Congress what to do and where to go. These "children" of Congress frequently deny United States Senators information which they have because it is of such a secret nature that Congress has no right to it. A real awakened Congress would spend about two months investigating Federal officers who should be impeached and putting these inferior commissioners in jail for contempt. The Members of the House and Senate should read the Constitution and relearn, if they have ever learned it before, that they can pass laws without asking anybody under the sun. If you suggest the passage of a certain bill, the first thing an elected Congressman or Senator wants to know is whether or not it has had the approval of some little bureaucrat and would the President sign such a measure if Congress did pass it. They surely have the inferiority complex even worse than farmers.

To-day I shall discuss three bills now pending in the House and Senate. If a million people listening in at this hour would each write to their Congressmen and Senators asking them to support these measures, telling them that you and your neighbors are going to hold them accountable in the next election, you would make easy the job of the three national farm organizations which are here in Washington attending this session of Congress.

WANTON DESTRUCTION

There are many instances of wanton destruction on the part of these various departments of government. In many instances the destruction takes place without the consent of Congress. At the disarmament conference, held in Washington and called by President Harding, a related navy strength program was agreed to by the various nations represented. This agreement involved the proposition of destroying a number of vessels this country had in the process of construction. We took half-built vessels that had cost the Government millions of dollars and destroyed them. All any other nation had to do was to tear up the plans and specifications of proposed warships. There is an old saying that "The United States never lost a war and never won a conference."

To-day, without action of Congress, public buildings here in Washington are marked for destruction. These buildings are of such permanent construction that they would be good buildings in a thousand years from now. Last spring, all over Europe, I saw many buildings a thousand years old. They were of no more permanent construction than these in Washington that are marked to be torn down. I hold in my hand a letter, dated the 8th of this month and signed by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, written to a United States Senator, and from which I now read:

"The public-building program under the Treasury Department contemplates the ultimate replacement of the Post Office Building located at Twelfth and Pennsylvania Avenue, the old Southern Railway Office Building at Thirteenth and Pennsylvania Avenue, and the Municipal Building which occupies the block bounded by Thirteen-and-a-half, Fourteenth, D, and E Streets.

"The Post Office Building was constructed at a cost of $2,585,000 and was completed November 26, 1898. The Southern Railway Building was purchased by the Government on August 4, 1928, and the estimated value of the improvements at that time was $1,087,500. The cost of constructing the Municipal Building was $1,968,877. The building was occupied May, 1908."

You will observe that here is a destruction of more than five and a half million dollars worth of property. I am told that the only excuse is that the architecture of these buildings does not harmonize with the plans for beautifying the National Capital. A lack of harmony in the architecture of the various buildings appears to offend the highly developed æsthetic natures of some of our public officials. Of course it could be possible that instead of an offended æsthetic nature a fat juicy construction contract might be the motive. I recommend that you write your Congressmen and Senators demanding an investigation of the tearing down of these buildings.

Talk about public offices being a profitable business, I call your attention to the fact that in the last 10 years, on advice from time to time of the Secretary of the Treasury, the income-tax rates on incomes over $1,000,000 or more have been reduced from 65 per cent to a fraction less than 16 per cent.

ANTIHOARDING PROGRAM

Since talking to you a month ago the President called an antihoarding conference. Among those invited and attending were representatives of farmers and negroes. Can you imagine the necessity of getting a pledge from farmers and negroes that they will quit hoarding. I want you all to know that I did not attend this conference. The permanent committee left in charge of the antihoarding campaign has as a part of its program the selling of Government baby bonds as small as $50. I am just wondering how this will put the money in circulation. It appears to me it takes it out of circulation. Nine times out of ten, the poor fellow who has $50 in his pocket will be spending a little to-morrow. When he invests it in a bond it prevents every chance of his spending it. The $50 goes into the Treasury of the United States along with a lot of other money hoarded there. It is possible they are figuring when the poor fellow wants to spend some money he will sacrifice his bond at about ninety cents on the dollar to some coupon clipper. Of all the hypocracy being practiced at this time, and it is here in every shape and form, I am sure the greatest is this antihoarding program. Those who are promoting it have control of more hoarded money than all the rest of the people put together. Under present laws the Federal reserve banks could issue at any time as much as three and one-half billion dollars on the surplus of gold in the Treasury and another three and one-half billion dollars on eligible Government bonds. They are the hoarders and not the people.

WAR

With all my heart, with all my soul, and with all my might I urge you—I plead with you to write your Congressmen and Senators demanding them to do everything possible to prevent this country being drawn into the China-Japanese trouble, which threatens to become a world war. I want to read a little from a report of the great war correspondent, Floyd Gibbons. Listen to me, and in listening, picture this country involved, and mothers, your sons were being described instead of the sons of Chinese and Japanese mothers. I read from Floyd Gibbons:

"If you knew a murder was going to be committed in about seven hours and there was nothing you could do or apparently anybody could do to prevent it, how would you feel?

"Suppose instead of just an ordinary homicide, this was going to be a wholesale murder—a slaughter?

"Between sixty and seventy thousand strong, vigorous, healthy young men—many of them boys in their teens—are sleeping on their arms to-night within half an hour's walk of this room.

"All of them have been generously supplied with the latest and most-improved instruments for killing and maiming.

"Twenty-five thousand comprise one group—the Japanese.

"There are about 40,000 in the other group—Chinese.

"The two groups hate each other, not individually but as groups.

"Some time around 7 o'clock to-morrow morning—according to the present murder schedule which has been announced as officially and publicly as any sporting competition—these two groups of young men will hurl themselves at each other's throats.

"With shell, lead, and explosive, with bayonet, bullets, and bombs, the grisly spectacle will open and continue until one side or the other gives way.

"About 5,000 American soldiers, marines, and sailors will occupy ringside seats, some of them dangerously close to the conflict, because at any moment after the opening of hostilities this fight is liable to get out of the ring and spread over the arena."

Only a man on the battle front could give such a vivid description of the horrors of war. I want you to get this. All war is for profit. If we are finally drawn into this Far East conflict, it will be to protect rich men's property. This Government should immediately afford an opportunity for every citizen to get out of that country at once, and if necessary for this country to reimburse all these citizens for the loss of a few million dollars of property, do it, instead of going into a war that may cost a million lives and billions of dollars.

Here is someting interesting. One day last week, while attending a hearing on Muscle Shoals before the Senate Agricultural Committee, I heard Mercer Reynolds, a member of the Muscle Shoals Commission, say that the United States Government has the largest poison-gas plant in the world. He also said that France had just recently purchased 40,000,000 gas masks and placed them where they are available for every man, woman, and child in that country.

I said that all war is for profit. During a war the manufacturers make the profit. After a war those who hold the obligations of the Government and the people make the profit. Let me give you an illustration. In the last war the manufacturers of this country in making contracts with Uncle Sam wrote into the contracts three provisions. First, that Uncle Sam must take the goods contracted for even though the war ended the next day. Second, Uncle Sam must ship those goods to France. Third, Uncle Sam must not bring them back to this country. Under this contract this Government was shipping goods to France a year after the war had ended. When the war did end the Government found itself with $4,000,000,000 worth of property in France. Under the contract our Government could not bring this property back. They sold it to France at 10 cents on the dollar or for a sum of $400,000,000. However, France has never paid the bill and we have now granted her a moratorium. Let me give you an illustration of how the manufacturers operated. The International Harvester Co., under this contract, sold and the Government shipped to France every kind of farm implement made by them. There was shipped to France of International Harvester make, corn planters, cultivators, grain drills, drag harrows, disc harrows, and if it were not such a tragedy it would be a real comedy, the International Harvester Co. sold to the United States and shipped to France, to be used in whipping the Kaiser, thousands of International Harvester Co. manure spreaders.

SWANK-THOMAS BILL

In my talk over this broadcasting system January 23 I suggested that those listening write their Congressmen and Senators and ask for copies of three certain bills. I take it that many of you did this and that you have read the bills. I now desire to discuss these bills and shall take up the Swank-Thomas bill first. The House bill is H. R. 7797 and in the Senate it is S. 3133. The authors are Congressman F. B. SWANK and Senator ELMER THOMAS, both of Oklahoma.

The bill is an amendment to the farm marketing act. It may be divided into three parts. The first part transfers the administration of the marketing act from the Federal Farm Board to the Department of Agriculture. This is immaterial to the Farmers' Union—it is not vital and we have so told the House and Senate Agricultural Committees. The last part of the bill provides for keeping on the farm that portion of a farm crop not needed for use in this country. It makes such part unsalable until such time as some foreign buyer may be willing to pay cost of production for it. This part of the bill is also not vital and we have so told the committees. It is immaterial to us what method the Government may use in disposing of the surplus of farm crops.

The heart of the bill and the part that is vital provides for securing cost of production for that part of farm crops used in this country. The three farm organizations have adopted as a slogan, "Nothing less than cost of production for that part of farmers' crops used in this country is a remedy." I am sure that my audience will agree that no institution can operate at less than cost any longer than their capital lasts. An institution selling at less than cost of operation, if it continues to operate, must do so by borrowing on its capital. Farmers have been operating at less than cost of production so long that more than one-half of them have lost their farms through foreclosures and tax sales. That is why we say that nothing less than cost of production for that part of farm products used in this country is a remedy.

Price fixing is not new. Everything a farmer buys the seller sets the price. Even the farmers' products, after they get out of his hands, have a fixed price. Everything the Government touches the purchaser must pay a fixed price. I have never known postage stamps to sell at a discount. There are nearly a million Federal officers and employees with their services paid at a fixed price. No person can get their jobs by offering to serve for less. A ticket on the railroad, bus, boat, or airplane must be purchased at a fixed price. Why should anyone fear a fixed price on farmers' products?

Here are a few fundamentals. No unorganized group has anything to say about the price of their products. No unorganized group can take advantage of a tariff on their products. The farmers of this Nation in relation to other groups are organized to a less degree than any other group. The work of a farmer tends to make him an individualist. The members of no other group are so completely isolated from each other as are farmers, and this isolated condition of living makes him an individualist. I could qualify in court as an expert witness in the matter of organizing farmers. It is my opinion, formed out of 16 years of continuous organizing work, that they will not in the near future organize to a degree where they can set the price of their products. Here is another fundamental: When a group of producers do not set the price of their own products, somebody else does it for them. In the case of farmers, a handful of gamblers on the Chicago Board of Trade set the price of his grain. Another handful of gamblers on the cotton exchanges set the price of his cotton. And so on through the whole list of his products the prices are set by those who care not whether that price gives the farmer the cost of producing his crops.

In support of my statement that a tariff does not operate for an unorganized group let me cite wool as a farm crop on which there is a 30 cents per pound tariff. Yet farmers get less than one-half that price for wool. Also the case of wool proves that surplus is only a scarecrow. In the last 10 years we have imported one-half billion pounds of wool more than we exported. We do not produce as much wool as we consume. Yet farmers are not getting more than one-fourth the cost of production. This ought to show any intelligent person that to reduce production of wheat to domestic consumption, so long as you let the wheat gamblers price it, there would be no assurance of farmers getting cost of production.

The Swank-Thomas bill provides that the Government shall regulate the marketing of farm crops just like the Government regulates the marketing of transportation. The Government under the interstate commerce law does not buy or sell transportation, but it does say what the price of every pound of freight shall be. It fixes this price on the cost of the transportation. The Swank-Thomas bill provides that all that part of the major farm crops, such as wheat, wool, cotton, pork, beef, poultry, and dairy products used in this country, shall be purchased by licensed buyers at a minimum price covering cost of production. Cost of production includes pay for all labor used in producing the crop and interest on the investment. This does not put the Government in business any more than the regulation of transportation puts them in business.

It is well to remember that exports of agricultural products are now only about 5 per cent more tnan imports. The 1900 census shows 30 per cent more. In other words in 30 years our surplus has decreased from 30 per cent to about 5 per cent. At the same rate, in a few years, we will be an importing Nation so far as agricultural products are concerned. The Swank-Thomas bill contemplates that farmers will be prosperous if they can have cost of production for what the home folks use. Surely no real American wants to eat a farmer's bread and butter at less than it cost the farmer to produce it.

We have precedent for doing the thing the Swank-Thomas bill provides. February, 1919, delegations of farmers' unions from one-half dozen Midwestern States came to Washington and promoted a bill through Congress providing for a minimum price for that year's crop of wheat. The bill also provided for an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 to be used in making the price effective. Remember this was after the war had closed and before any of the spring crop had even been sowed. The Government, just as provided in the Swank-Thomas bill, licensed all purchasers of wheat such as mills and elevators. Then these licensees were told, "If you pay less than $2.26 per bushel for No. 1 wheat, Chicago basis, your license will be canceled and your business closed." The result of this legislation was that the gamblers on the Grain Exchange in Chicago were forced to gamble above this guaranteed minimum price and the market went up and stayed around $3 per bushel up to May 1, 1920, when the law expired. There were three nice things about the 1919 guaranteed minimum price for wheat. First, it did not cost the Government a penny. Second, the price of bread did not advance in spite of the fact that farmers received 75 cents per bushel more for their wheat that year than they did the two years of the war, and thus it did not cost the consumer anything. Third, it is the only year in 20 years, according to Government figures, that wheat farmers made a profit on wheat. If farmers needed such aid for their 1919 crop they need it ten times as badly for their 1932 crop.

France, Germany, Italy, and other European countries have been doing this very thing for their farmers ever since the war. A little less than a year ago wife and I were in France. We visited cousins of hers who are farmers. In April last year, the very week we were there, they were selling wheat at $1.85 per bushel, figured in our money. It was much higher in theirs. We found that farmers in Italy received $1.80 per bushel and in Germany $1.88 per bushel. Each of these Governments had a minimum guaranteed price, just like we had in 1919, and their prices played above the minimum every year. In France the minimum was $1.71, and farmers were getting $1.85.

The great cartoonist, John M. Baer, made a cartoon, recently carried in Labor and copied by many papers throughout the United States, in which he shows the wheat farmer in the United States with a bag of wheat marked 30 cents a bushel. This good American farmer is talking to Uncle Sam. He points to France, where the cartoon shows a wheat farmer of that country with his bag of wheat and a price of $1.80 per bushel. This American farmer says to Uncle Sam, "Can't this great Nation do as much for the American farmer as France does for its peasants?" In the cartoon is the American consumer of bread on the American side and the French consumer of bread on the French side of the cartoon. The French consumer has two loaves of bread under his arm, the American consumer one, and the American consumer is saying to Uncle Sam, "Yes; and I pay as much for a 1-pound loaf as a Frenchman pays for two." The Swank-Thomas bill undertakes to do for the American farmer exactly what the Government of France has been doing for its farmers for the last 15 years.

The farmers I talked to in France last April told me that they were the most prosperous they had ever been in their lives with the exception of during the World War when the lowest price they received for wheat was $3.48 per bushel. You farmers listening in at this time, if you are satisfied with the price the gamblers fix on your products, then turn from this hour happy and contented. If you are not satisfied with a gambler-fixed price, then turn from this hour and write your Congressman and Senators demanding them to support the Swank-Thomas bill. Call a mass meeting in your neighborhood and pass resolutions addressed to Hon. MARVIN JONES, chairman of the House Agricultural Committee, and Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY, chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee, demanding the Swank-Thomas bill be reported out at once.

FRAZIER BILL

In the series of the three bills none is more important than the refinancing bill introduced by Senator FRAZIER. Five State legislatures have passed resolutions memorializing Congress to enact the Frazier bill into law. Farmers owe so much that they can not pay the present high rates of interest and taxes. The Mid-West States are fast becoming the largest landholders in America. In the last few years, through tax sales, 70,000,000 acres of land have become the property of a dozen States. The Frazier bill provides for refinancing farmers on a basis of 1½ per cent interest and 1½ per cent payment on the principal each year—a total of 3 per cent per year. If the Frazier bill becomes a law, it means a reduction of total interest paid by farmers of at least $500,000,000 per year. Even though farmers were getting cost of production they could not pay their debts at the present high rates of interest, which means the Frazier bill is vital to the economic life of agriculture.

The Frazier bill has in it provision for the Government issuing money to loan to farmers to pay off their present indebtedness. It is estimated it would require three or four billion dollars to refinance those farmers who would make application. Everybody here in Washington, from the President down, now admits there is not enough money in circulation to do the business of the country. Every bill passed in this session of Congress has provisions for increasing the volume of currency, but on a basis of paying interest to bankers, which means increased taxes on the 120,000,000 common people of the country. The Frazier bill provides for Government money instead of bankers' money. It will be a source of revenue to the extent of 1½ per cent to the Government and thus will reduce the taxes of us 120,000,000 common people.

To all farmers listening in who are satisfied with the rates of interest they are paying I want you to turn from this hour smiling, happy, and contended, but to all those listening in who would like to have a loan on the terms of the Frazier bill turn from this hour determined to do your part to give your Congressmen and Senators the courage to look international bankers in the eye and say, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

WHEELER BILL S. 2487

Money is a crop, just like wheat or cotton. The value of the unit of a crop depends largely upon the size of the crop. When the crop of wheat is a small one the value of the unit, a bushel of wheat, goes up. When the crop of wheat is a large one the value of a bushel of wheat goes down. The same thing is true of the money crop. When there is a large crop of money the purchasing power of the unit of money, a dollar, goes down. When there is a small crop of money the purchasing power of the dollar goes up.

The money crop is by far the most important of any crop, because it measures to a large extent the value of all other crops. A high-priced dollar means a dollar that will buy a lot of wheat, a lot of cotton, a lot of any commodity. The important thing about change in the purchasing power of a dollar is its effect on fixed charges, such as taxes, debts, and interest on debts. Hence, the control of the money crop is the most powerful influence in the Nation.

The Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall have power to coin and regulate the value of money." Regulating the value of money is done by controlling the volume of money. It was never intended that Congress should transfer this power to anybody else, but they did. In the national bank act of Civil War times, the demonetization of silver in 1873, and the Federal reserve act in 1914 Congress absolutely transferred the control of the money crop in the country to a handful of international bankers. They can make the crop big, as they did during the war, and the purchasing power of the dollar comes down.

May 1, 1920, the volume of money was so big in this country that a dollar would only buy one-third of a bushel of wheat. It would only buy 2½ pounds of cotton. It would buy less than 2 pounds of butterfat. Farmers and other people borrowed lots of money when it took so little of their product to purchase a dollar. Then out of a clear sky those who control the crop of money ordered the payment of notes and other obligations, and as fast as notes were paid currency was destroyed.

A little while ago I told you that one set of war profiteers are those who hold the obligation of the people and the Government. Let me amplify. The latter part of January, 1920, I was here in Washington attending to some business for members of the Oklahoma Farmers' Union, of which I was president at that time. While here I visited Mr. John Skelton Williams, who was the Comptroller of the Currency. I asked Mr. Williams, "When is deflation to begin?" He answered me, "The other members of the board have just voted for it to begin May 1 this year." Then he told me this sordid story. He said, "I told them that such a course would break lots of little country banks." He said, "They answered me that the little banks ought to break, there are too many of them." Tears were on his cheeks when he said that he told them "such a course would ruin lots of farmers, and that they cold-bloodedly replied, 'They ought to be ruined; they are getting so prosperous they won't work.'"

At that time there were 30,000 banks in this country. To-day there are about 20,000. Ten thousand have closed their doors. And I know I am conservative when I say that one-half the farmers have been ruined. I have a number of citizens to corroborate this testimony of mine. I would have no trouble in establishing this in a court of record. I am telling it to you in order that you may know that this thing did not just happen. I want you to know it was deliberately planned and diabolically carried out. He who says no one is to blame is either an ignoramus or a knave.

As proof that I believed what Mr. Williams told me, I went back to my home in Oklahoma and on the 5th day of February, 1920, made a public sale. I did not wait to catalogue my registered shorthorns. I did not wait to get an expert auctioneer for the full-blooded livestock I put in that sale. I employed a farm auctioneer living there in the community and described the breeding of my livestock myself.

I expect there are farmers listening in at this hour who purchased cattle at my sale, with the banker standing at their elbow urging them to bid, assuring them that their note would be carried more than the six months for which it was being made. When the note was due six months later, that banker, through orders that came from the international bankers, forced those farmers to pay their notes, and many of them sold the same cattle at one-fourth of what they paid for them February 5, six months before. As further proof that I believed what Mr. Williams said, I was at that time editor of the Oklahoma Union Farmer, which went to every member of the Farmers' Union in Oklahoma. In the February 1st issue, 1920, I warned the members of what I had learned from the Comptroller of the Currency. I do not want you to blame the little banker in your town. He was as innocent as a baby and as surprised and shocked as you were when he was informed May 1st notes must be paid.

The job the Wheeler bill proposes to do is to break the strangle hold the international bankers have on the money crop of this country. I firmly believe there is no bill the international bankers will do more to defeat than the Wheeler bill, remonetizing silver. If you want to deal a blow to these pirates of finance, shower your Congressmen and Senators with letters, petitions, and telegrams until they have the courage to look an international banker in the eye and defy the power that has gripped your National Capital. The battle here is—

SILVER MONEY VERSUS BANKERS' DEBT MONEY

There was a $2,000,000,000 dole given to big business in a recent act of Congress, all based on a debt that bears interest, and to pay which taxes must be levied from the 120,000,000 common people.

Just recently a bill has passed both Houses and signed by the President giving additional control of the money crop to these international bankers up to at least a production of another $8,000,000,000. All of this is based on the interest plan, and the control completely in the hands of the international bankers' financial wrecking crew.

You should insist that your Congressmen and Senators vote for the remonetization of silver. If made a law, it will increase the volume of basic money in this country by $2,000,000,000 without cost to the taxpayers of the Nation. It is money over which international bankers have no control. It is the money of the 120,000,000 common people of our Nation. We have been robbed of our money; let us restore it to ourselves and give the 20,000 ultra-rich their money, the gold of the country. Gold is a note-increasing money, while silver is a note-reducing money.

My friend John M. Baer has drawn another cartoon showing these international bankers as note raisers. They took a farmer's note for $3,000 May 1, 1920, placing a mortgage on the farmer's land to secure the note. At that time 1,000 bushels of wheat in Chicago would have paid the note. These international bankers changed the 3 in that note to 18, which is raising it from a $3,000-note to an $18,000 one. In other words, with wheat at 50 cents a bushel it now takes 6,000 bushels to pay the $3,000 note. The same is true if measured in cotton, in pork, in beef, or most any farm commodity.

We must have the Wheeler bill in order to make it possible for us to pay the debts we made when wheat was $3 a bushel and cotton 40 cents a pound.

Gold is a trade-killer money while silver is a trade-getter money. Three-fourths of the people of the world can sell to us but can not buy from us, because we are on a gold standard and they are on a silver or bimetallic standard. Canada, since England has gone off the gold standard, can ship butter into this country, pay the tariff, take a gold dollar back and change it into $1.33 of their money, which, after paying the tariff, shows a profit. If the Wheeler bill were passed, in 30 days the nations of the world would be at our doors ready to buy products for which at the present we have no world market.

The prosperity and happiness of our people depends upon three things—production, distribution, and exchange. Two of these things are working—production and distribution. Production is working, as evidenced by the fact that the farmers' granaries are full and the manufacturers' warehouses are overflowing. Distribution is working. We eat strawberries in Washington to-day that were picked in Florida yesterday. The third thing—exchange—has fallen down. The gold standard has proven inadequate not only for this Nation but for the whole world as well.

Mr. L. D. Brandeis, a member of the United States Supreme Court, in a book written 10 years ago, entitled "Other People's Money and How the Bankers Use It," said: "We must break the Money Trust or the Money Trust will break us."

Sir Henry Deterding, head of Shell Oil Co., recently said: "This barring of silver is undoubtedly one of the main causes of the restriction of world trade to-day."

Roger Babson, the great economist, said September 28, 1931: "Silver will be remonetized. The purchasing power of silver thus restored will boost the purchasing power of countries on a silver basis. Until this is done the recovery of world business will be delayed."

Arthur Brisbane said recently: "The bankers want money as scarce as possible so that they may more easily control it and increase their power, but they are short-sighted and must realize soon that gold is too scarce and is actually cornered by two nations, leaving the others without real money to carry on the business of the world."

The recent bills passed by Congress to make more money not only are to be condemned because they are on a basis of paying interest to bankers but more to be condemned because they only pretend to be temporary relief. The bills themselves provide that the increased circulation shall be withdrawn at the end of a year.

If you are satisfied for international bankers to continue to control all the money crop, then turn from this hour happy and contented. On the other hand, if your soul rebels against what has been done and what is being done and you desire to add $2,000,000,000 to the world's supply of money, a permanent increase in the volume of our circulating medium, then neither eat nor sleep until you have done your duty as a citizen in securing the passage of the Wheeler bill by writing your Congressmen and Senators demanding that they support this measure.

THE FARMERS' UNION

The Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America is just what its name implies—a class organization of farmers whose purpose is the educating of farmers to the end that they may cooperate. Education and cooperation are the two themes suggested in the full name of the organization. We are a militant farmers' class organization to which every farmer in the United States should belong. If every farmer in the Nation did belong, this thing could all be over in 10 days. There are a dozen ways we could get what is right if we were organized 100 per cent. If there is nothing done at this session of Congress to place agriculture on an equality with other industries, the fault will be with those farmers who have neglected to get into their own class organization, the Farmers' Union. Most other groups are into their unions 100 per cent, and I respect them for their intelligence in this matter. I have never been any place in the United States where the teachers were not members of their union to the last man or woman. I have never been any place where there was a nonunion banker—they all belong to their union. It is a mystery to me how some four or five million farmers in this country feel that they can get along without their organization when they see their business, laboring, and professional brothers organized 100 per cent. If it is necessary for all bankers to belong to their union in order to protect and better the conditions of their families, I am sure it is much more necessary for farmers to do the same thing.

Farmers listening in, as I close this talk, let me remind you that our enemies have said a million times and they express it in three words, "Farmers can't organize." Every farmer in the United States who is not a member of his class organization is a living witness to this statement of the enemy. I beg of you to become a member of your class organization. Do it at once. Quit bearing testimony for the enemy. Get on our side of the case and be a witness for us that farmers can organize. The enemy has three other words. You have heard them. They are, "Farmers won't stick." Ah, my brother member of the Farmers' Union out there in Colorado, in Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and a dozen other States, you, who have not paid your dues for 1932, have been a living witness for the enemy for 1 month and 27 days. Oh, I urge you, I plead with you, go to the local secretary before the sun goes down and by paying your dues get on our side of the case and be a witness for us that farmers will stick.

I am pleading with all my soul for you to get into the union, and I warn you that the rumblings of revolution are at your door. I know you can hear it. I warn you that want and hunger have been allowed to enter millions of homes and remain there unmolested. I know you can see it. I warn you that greed and avarice, clothed in royal purple, are respected and adored here in Washington, while love and unselfishness go in rags and are shunned as things unclean.

PLATFORM ADOPTED BY DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few days ago the dominant party in my State held a convention, adopted a platform, and selected delegates to attend the national convention in Chicago. The convention was harmonious, and undertook to interpret the issues and to suggest remedies.

The convention, without a dissenting voice, indorsed our governor, William H. Murray, for President; and inasmuch as the platform embodies the views of Governor Murray as to fundamental issues and suggested remedies, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the platform be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM SUBMITTED TO THE DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION AT OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., ON FEBRUARY 20, 1932, BY GOV. WILLIAM H. MURRAY

FUNDAMENTALS

New issues arise and old issues perish, but the fundamental docrine of the Democratic Party must ever remain one and the same to-day as when these principles gave it birth—belief in written constitutional government of three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, equal and coordinate, to the end that we may ever remain a government of laws and not a government of men, such laws to bear equally upon all without regard to class or class distinction, such government never to be too weak for the strong nor too strong for the weak. We believe in a perpetual union of indestructible States and in local self-government in fullest measure consistent with general public order and stability.

The democracy of Jefferson, the nationalism of Jackson, the progressive economic betterment of Wilson and Bryan, and the liberty of Lincoln, linked with the safeguards to the people and limitations of government under the Federal and State Constitutions, which Constitutions and all amendments thereto we pledge to enforce, is the pledge of the Democratic Party for the future of America.

All citizens of the Republic—Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Gentile, pagan or persons of any or no belief whatever be the race—rich or poor, of high or low estate, are under the same obligations to and are entitled to the equal protection of the laws and of the impartial rights of the Constitution. The poor and weak are always, and are now, the subject of special care and solicitude of government.

The Constitution, being the fundamental law—the sober second thought of the people, designed by them to establish orderly, efficient government, to define the powers of public officials, and to restrain themselves in moments of passion—and all amendments thereto, have been brought forward at the instance of the people of the several States and adopted free from fanaticism or party rancor. We hold that other changes of the Constitution or amendments adopted or repealed should come from the people and receive sanction by the States or people without party coercion.

The Democratic Party is, as its name implies, a party of the people, to serve the whole of humanity. It stands equally opposed to the cormorant and the commune—opposed alike to those on one side who want a few to own everything as well as those on the other who want no one to own anything. It stands for an equitable division of created wealth, under fair competition, regulated by just laws, restraining unscrupulous, intellectual, cunning, and corrupt combinations of capital and wealth.

We favor rigid honesty, economy, and efficiency in government, State and National.

We believe in peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliance with none.

We believe in industrial and social justice.

We believe in the equality of economic opportunity.

We believe that this country should be in the future, as in the past, "the land of opportunity," unfettered by privilege and unshackled by monopoly.

We believe that less taxes, more trade, and no trusts are essential alike to the emancipation and to the prosperity of the unprivileged masses.

PARAMOUNT ISSUES

We declare the paramount questions of the hour to be to provide for the unemployed; for the security of old age against hardships and poverty; and the economic betterment of the great middle class, now threatened with bankruptcy and extermination, which, if continued, would mean the erection in this fair land the social system of the Old World, with but two classes—the rich and the very poor—and, once poor, always poor, with no hope of advancement, social, financial, or political. In such a society, the rise of another Lincoln would be impossible. Personal and political liberty would perish, with economic enslavement of common humanity, and a political structure of the corrupt combination of corporate capital and wealth, supported and fostered by the abuse of the equity powers of courts through injunction, until the Republic ultimately became a veritable "government by injunction," enforced by marshals and military power, destroy entirely the rights of common humanity to those constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech, of action, and of thought, often recently perpetrated by the inferior Federal courts against the laboring man in his just demands for fair treatment and a living wage.

The restoration of the great middle class, we declare, must come through extending credit and banking privileges to the producers who operate the farm, the field, pasture, forest, and mines; to independent merchants; to the small manufacturers and little enterprises; to cease fostering stock and grain gambling and the speculator, who "neither sows nor reaps" nor adds one cent of wealth to the Nation nor employs labor. To this end we declare for the repeal of the 10 per cent tax passed by a Congress serving bondholders and the speculators of Wall Street and which tax drove out of existence the Scotch agricultural banks which had served so well the producers of the land since the formative period of the Government, from 1790 down to 1875.

We favor provision for the installation of the Scotch banking system for the producers and for the little manufacturer and commercial man; and, in the interest of a growing foreign commerce, the placing on the Federal banking board of the Federal reserve system no banker and substituting therefor qualified men in the fields of manufacture, transportation, production, and marketing as the first step toward the employment of labor.

We condemn the system of issuing bills of credit, bank notes, or currency based on debts, public or private, as a failure, in that it can not be the measure for needed extra currency; and we favor basing banking notes or currency on the product or article of value which made extra currency necessary as the true measure of needed extra currency and as sound in principle, in that it represents the exchange value of one product in exchange with another.

We hold that since Congress, under the Constitution, is authorized to coin money, that it is the duty of the Government to coin both gold and silver in sufficient quantity to meet the regular or normal demands of commerce and business and in aid further of the farmer and independent business man; that we declare for tax reform, State and National, based upon the ability to pay and the service of Government received, through a graduated income-tax system; for economy in government by abolishing all unnecessary boards and commissions, and by preventing duplication of service, so that coordinated government may take the place of our bureaucratic system, for, wherever in the world, ancient and modern, bureaucratic government has existed, it has been attended by lawless administration, extravagance, and corruption, and fostered, as in ancient times, by limitation on the freedom of speech and, in modern times, by poisoning the source of information, which inevitably results in erroneous conclusions of the citizen on public measures and administrations through false information.

The Democratic Party believes in a government in strict conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all the branches—executive, congressional, and judicial—and deplores the practice of the inferior Federal courts for the past 30 years in their exercising powers not within their jurisdiction, often arbitrary to the extent of nullifying the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of action, particularly in labor controversies, and in the interest of great corporations, creating for them a "twilight zone" of escape from control both by the Federal and State Governments, and exemptions from the payment of their just share of taxes to both Governments; and the Democratic Party pledges a strenuous effort to resist such usurpation of power, and pledges its Members of Congress to impeach any Federal judge who, in the future, by abuse of his equity power, attempts to destroy the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, particularly those clauses guaranteeing freedom of the press and freedom of speech and the eleventh amendment.

The eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States was adopted alone, and expressly provides that the judicial power of the Federal courts shall not extend to the right of a citizen, natural or corporate, to drag a sovereign State into the courts; and, notwithstanding such provision, the Federal courts in the past several decades have repeatedly issued writs of injunction against and sought to bring into court the sovereign States of the Union, in violation of the eleventh amendment.

The Democratic Party condemns the present policy of the Republican Party in promoting the loans of international bankers directly to foreign nations, for the reason that it involves our Nation, and causes us to be interested in the political fortunes of the administration and forms of government of such nations, through fear of loss of such loans. The Democratic Party would rather promote such loans to the development of foreign countries through private grants to private enterprises, thus giving an outlet to professional engineers and other skilled Americans, and, at the same time, an outlet through such enterprises for the sale of American agricultural and manufactured articles. We declare that the American Government and its citizens will ever applaud and encourage democracy in governments with republican forms, but that the form of government in other nations is not our concern, otherwise we must needs become embroiled in their controversies, fanaticism, and hate, which invariably endangers our peace and safety.

We are opposed to repudiation and we believe in national honor; we call upon the nations of Europe to preserve theirs by making a sincere effort to pay their obligations to us in the same coin received, and not be their irate idiaoma. We are generous enough to indulge those who require more time for the discharge of their obligations, but do not sanction repudiation of them.

The Democratic Party is a party of international peace, which can be attained by justice and fair play; and that policy of justice toward the nationals of other nations, and between ours and theirs, the Democratic Party will ever seek to do, to exact, and to perform, as the surest and safest method of promoting international peace. We believe in the reduction of the world's armament, and pledge our reduction in proportion to their reduction, and we further declare that not another dollar shall be loaned by American capitalists to any nation to construct battleships or armaments or ordnances for war.

The rights of an American citizen should be protected wherever he may be lawfully found—whether on the border, the high seas, or in foreign lands. Throughout the world the Stars and Stripes should be to him an ever safe shield.

The Democratic Party believes in promoting our foreign commerce, in continuing our commerce to its normal, natural strength in Europe and through the "open-door" policy in the Orient, but with special effort in Latin America, as providing an outlet for our agricultural and manufactured products, where conflicts are least likely to occur to disturb our foreign relations and peace with neighboring nations; for the further reason that Latin America can furnish us with coffee, rubber, hardwoods, and all other raw materials needed, and we can furnish Latin America with all the products they need, thus promoting trade by providing cargo each way and a balance in the exchange of the moneys. We favor the continuation of the policy of reciprocity with Latin America, and extending it so as to give outlet for the products of the farm as well as those of the manufacturer. We believe in the most cordial and cooperative relations with all of Latin America, without interfering with the political or social problems of any of them.

The Democratic Party stands for the preservation of the Monroe doctrine, with a view to preserving the Western Hemisphere from the schemes of monarchal Europe and to secure the safety and justice throughout the Western Hemisphere, with the corollary of that doctrine growing out of the American-Isthmian policy in the construction of the Panama Canal and the purpose to construct the Nicaragua Canal. Since said canal, in a very great measure, increases our naval strength, by permitting the mobilization of the Pacific and Atlantic squadrons on either coast readily in case of attack on either shore, and since the Nicaragua Canal would shorten the distance of travel between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards approximately five days, the construction of such canal would thereby further increase our naval strength as well as aid commerce in the world's trade; and since we hold by treaty agreement with Nicaragua the right to construct such canal, and since two canals would be needed to facilitate the world's commerce, and one would be a protection to the other against bombing planes in case of war, we therefore favor the construction of the Nicaragua canal as speedily as the financial condition of the country will permit.

The Democratic Party believes in a small skeleton Army, consisting of a full quota of well-trained officers, artillery, airplanes, and coast defense, which require great length of time for preparation or construction, with the smallest possible private soldiery consistent with safety in time of peace, for a citizen soldiery can always be readily organized for service, while it requires years to train good officers and to construct fortifications.

In all future wars the Democratic Party favors conscripting both men and property for the purpose of war.

The American people have always had the good sense to support appropriations for an adequate Navy, which is more necessary now than heretofore, because of our great length of coast, and for the protection of our ever-growing foreign commerce, and developing and extending merchant marine.

We are proud of the achievements in the past of the American Navy, in that it destroyed the opposing fleet in most of the wars in which we have been engaged, and has never been whipped in battle.

The inferior Federal courts, in passing upon questions growing out of the interstate commerce laws, have created a "twilight zone," which has hampered and restricted the States in the taxation of property and business employed in interstate commerce within the several States, upon equal terms with the taxation of property and business employed in intrastate commerce; thus permitting such property and business employed in interstate commerce to escape fair and just taxation by the States. Therefore, it is the sense of the Democratic Party that Congress should pass such legislation as will clarify and define the power of the States to levy equal taxation upon the property and business employed in both interstate and intrastate commerce within the several States, as has been done by Congress in clarifying and defining the power of the States to levy taxes upon national banks and the property of Indian tribes; and, to that end, we favor Senate bill 3074 (72d Cong., 1st sess.), now pending before the Committee on Finance.

In the enactment of income tax laws we favor the highest rates on excess salaries paid to managers and officers of corporations to discourage them, as a just measure in the interest of the stockholders whose just shares of profits are too often consumed by the managers of the concern to whom the citizen has entrusted his surplus earnings; with a like heavy tax upon large inheritances and corporations or persons who may show a net excess profit annually as a just tribute to the public upon excess profits and monopolies. These excess and unjust profits were taken from the public, and, in justice, should be returned to the public, through taxation.

In the law governing the assessing of income tax, a corporation should have all of its subsidiaries and holding companies considered and assessed as one concern; and thus defeat the cunning effort to deprive either the State or Nation of its just proportion of taxes.

We believe in extending equal benefits of tariff laws to the farmer and all producers of raw materials, as provided for the manufacturers; we believe in a tariff that would equal the difference of cost at home and abroad. Under such a tariff, monopoly can never arise; competition is always fostered, and the largest encouragement given to foreign trade. We condemn the Republican high protection tariff, for the reason that such tariff produces no revenue, but fosters monopoly, and destroys foreign trade, and it has been one of the most potent contributing causes of the present panic and of our army of unemployed.

The Democratic Party proclaims, as of first importance, for the betterment of all producers—the farmer, the stock grower, the fruit grower, and gardener—by extending easy credit at the lowest rate of interest, permitting them to move, hold, and market the products and by providing sure and certain markets with living profits, and for this purpose we reaffirm the platform of agricultural betterment adopted at Houston, Tex., in 1928.

The principle is fundamentally sound to encourage the ownership of farm lands in small tracts by actual farm home owners. We therefore favor legislation, State and national, that will discourage and prevent our farms becoming permanently owned or controlled by corporations, with additional provision to aid the actual home owners to acquire homes for themselves and families, with either abolition of or at least a limit to a minimum the amount of ad valorem tax that may be collected on the homes of the people. We hold that every law, State and national, should have for its ultimate purpose the fortification of the home, the protection of the family, the security of wife and mother, that they may develop and train up healthy children to become sober, moral, and law-abiding citizens, as the only sure guarantee of the perpetuity of the Republic.

We favor the conservation of our natural resources now rapidly becoming exhausted—the fertility of the soil, the forests, oil and gas, lead, copper, and zinc, and other minerals. To promote this service we favor invoking the power of "the league of States" and treaties with the States and the Federal Government defining the duties of each, as was done to decide the controversy of the source of the waters of the Boulder Dam project, as the surest plan for the conservation of these natural resources and for remuneration of enterprises developing these natural resources as the best way under the Constitution of the United States.

The Democratic Party, as a matter of common justice, favors paying speedily the remainder of the bonus due the veterans of the World War; and further, because these payments being paid in all parts of the country will prove an economic betterment to all classes of business and enterprises in all sections of the Republic.

The Democratic Party pledges to operate the Government within the revenues, and to make payment of the public debt as speedily as it is possible so to do. The payment of the public debt and stop increasing it is the surest method of extinguishing the overhead, which produces the high cost of living and increased taxation.

We stand for the principles of Jefferson; we declare the foregoing as of paramount importance, and we reaffirm the party's declaration of principles in the most recently adopted platform, as fully and as completely as if repeated here, as adopted in Tulsa in 1930, and in Houston in 1928; and, upon the foregoing declaration of principles, sincerely approved, we appeal to all Americans to unite with us upon them, and to support candidates only for public office who will honestly endeavor to carry them out.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Schall
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Sheppard
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Shipstead
Barkley	Dickinson	Kendrick	Smith
Bingham	Dill	Keyes	Smoot
Black	Fess	King	Steiwer
Blaine	Fletcher	La Follette	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	Lewis	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	George	Logan	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Glass	McGill	Townsend
Broussard	Glenn	McNary	Trammell
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Morrison	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hale	Moses	Wagner
Capper	Harrison	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hastings	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hatfield	Norris	Waterman
Connally	Hawes	Nye	Watson
Coolidge	Hayden	Oddie	Wheeler
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Reed

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, the Senator from Montana proposes, in line 7, before the word "committed," to insert the words "threatened or," so that if amended it will read:

(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be continued unless restrained.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise simply to say that if the amendment should be adopted I shall ask that the bill be further amended by the insertion, after the word "be," in line 8, of the words "committed or," so that it will read:

That unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be committed or continued unless restrained.

I understand that in the event of the adoption of these amendments the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has an amendment to offer which will further guard against abuses of the writ, in which amendment I quite heartily concur.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the amendment of the minority applying to that clause reads as follows, and I commend it to the attention of the Senator from Montana:

(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be executed or continued unless restrained.

It occurred to me that the language was a little better and applied to both contingencies. I will read it again for the information of the Senator:

That unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be executed or continued unless restrained.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is exactly the same as the language proposed by me, except that I have used the word "committed" instead of "executed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have reached a complete understanding with the Senator from Montana, if it is agreeable to the Senate. I shall have no objection to this amendment of the Senator from Montana if, at the end of line 8, certain language is added, which I shall read in a moment. I desire simply to state that unless modified in some way, and this amendment agreed to, it seems to me there would be great possibility of damage and injury that we are not thinking about.

As I tried to say on Friday, we ought to be, I think, extremely careful lest an unfriendly Federal district judge do what some Federal district judges have been doing during the last 10 years, and which, as a matter of fact, has been mainly responsible for the demands for reform that have become almost universal.

For instance, to be specific, one of these district judges held that the organization of the United Mine Workers of America, standing alone and of itself, was an illegal act, and a violation of the antitrust laws of the United States. To the credit of the Supreme Court be it said that, although they affirmed the judgment, they set aside that part, and distinctly stated that no such finding was justified, and that no such conclusion could be drawn as a matter of law. I mention that only to illustrate the difficulty.

Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Montana were agreed to; and, as I said the other day, if we were going always into an unbiased and unprejudiced court, I would not object to it, because it is the language usually used in a statute affecting injunctions. But suppose there were danger of a strike, and a union had a dispute with the owners of a mine, let us say. Let us suppose they were trying to adjust the difficulties, perhaps a question of wages, perhaps the question of working conditions, perhaps both. They may not have reached an agreement, and the union finally notifies the operator of the mine that they want a conference, and the operator of the mine says, "There is no use of a conference; I have nothing to confer with you about." Finally the union serves notice on the operator to this effect, "Unless you will give us a conference within 10 days from the date of this letter to take up with you working conditions and our wages," or whatever might be in dispute, "we will order a strike." That is all that will be necessary for some of the Federal district judges. They will say, "That is a threat," and they will issue an injunction on that statement.

I only offer that as an example. There are thousands of other ways in which it might arise. So I have submitted to the Senator from Montana a proposition to strike out, at the end of line 8, page 6, the semicolon and to insert a comma and this language, "But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons making the threat"——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It should be "threat of an unlawful act," should it not?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is what it means. It would be all right to ask that, although as a matter of fact I do not have it that way on the paper before me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator read it "or" instead of "of."

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read it again. "But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act." What does the Senator want?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It should be "of unlawful act."

Mr. NORRIS. This particular subsection refers to unlawful acts just as well as to threats.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; the section refers to unlawful acts committed, and the amendment proposes to add "unlawful acts threatened." The "committed" seems to be taken care of, and the Senator simply wants to take care of the matter of threats.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It should be, then, "No injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat of an unlawful act."

Mr. NORRIS. I want to include everything that is included in the language. I am perfectly willing to say "threat of an unlawful act" because that is what I mean, but I was including also unlawful acts of themselves.

Does the Senator want the court to have power to issue an injunction on account of an unlawful act against somebody who is not claimed to have committed an unlawful act? Why not include unlawful acts the same as threats?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no objection to including them.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I have tried to do.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, let me inquire where the proposed amendment is to come.

Mr. NORRIS. At the end of line 8, on page 6.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I want to ask the Senator, because I want to be clear as to the point he is making, whether he believes that no injunction should issue under any circumstances on account of unlawful acts.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. KING. If a man threatens to burn a bridge over which a train is to go, should not an injunction issue?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and this is going to permit it.

Mr. KING. I may not understand the effect of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we say, "If you make a threat to burn a bridge." Senators have great concern about this bridge. Several Senators talked about it on Friday. I do not know just where the bridge is, but I think it was said to be located in Texas. Great concern was manifested about a threat to burn a bridge, and Senators said we ought to leave the law so that if anybody made a threat to burn that bridge he could be enjoined. I have no objection to that, and that is what I am trying to do; but I do not want a court to have power to issue an injunction on account of a threat made to burn a bridge against somebody who did not make the threat to burn the bridge. That is what I am trying to protect in this amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator has not yet had an opportunity to read his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have not yet had opportunity to read the amendment I am suggesting. That is what I am trying to do, and what I have said as preliminary is that I am afraid that if we do not do something of the kind, some Federal judge will do the very thing I am afraid of; that is, will issue an injunction because he finds that on general conditions there is a threat to strike, with all the difficulties that usually follow; that a strike is going to take place; and that there will be arson, murder, assault and battery, robbery, and everything. If a union says, "We are going to strike," he would consider that a threat. I want to provide that although he shall have power to issue an injunction against the man who threatened to burn this sacred bridge, he shall not issue an injunction, on account of somebody threatening to burn that bridge, against somebody who has never heard of the bridge and who has not had anything to do with it.

This is the language. I will start to read it again:

But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons making the threat or committing the unlawful act, or who actually authorizes the same or ratifies the same after actual knowledge thereof.

With that language added I have no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the amendment is entirely satisfactory to me and if we may have unanimous consent I shall ask that the amendment first offered by me, the amendment by which the words "committed or" shall be inserted after "be" in line 8, and the amendment now offered by the Senator may be voted on en bloc.

Mr. NORRIS. That would settle it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to add that I understand the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska perfectly, and I am entirely with him in the proposition.

Here is a great national organization, and some individual being a member of a constituent organization makes a threat that he is going to do some damage to the property of the employer. Or, we will say, even some local union makes a threat that it is going to do some damage. I do not want an injunction to go against the officers of the national organization, who perhaps have sent out instructions that every effort is to be made to preserve order and to prevent unlawful acts by anyone. Yet these injunctions go, and have gone repeatedly, against the national officers who have taken those very precautions, because some subordinate union or some irresponsible individual has made threats or actually done damage. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is quite proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the three amendments may be offered en bloc.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall have to object to the unanimous-consent request. If I may have the floor for a minute, I would like to explain my objection.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to include the words "threatened or committed" is entirely wise, and I want the opportunity to support it without having at the same time to seem to support the suggestion offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

If we may imagine the circumstances reversed for a moment, let us suppose that there is a group of mine owners, one of whom makes the statement that "We are going to burn down the headquarters of the United Mine Workers," and the United Mine Workers properly, naturally, file a bill to stop any such performance. Would it be said, in justice, Mr. President, that that injunction should be limited to the single one of the group who made that threat against the property of the mine union? I should say that, obviously, those associated with him, who might naturally be expected to act with him, ought to be included. But if there be one of them who has notoriously protested against this proposed illegal act, naturally the court should not include that person within the scope of the injunction.

So, if the national officers of a union are doing their best to prevent disorder and unlawful acts, no court is justified in including those national officers in any injunction directed against those who threaten disorder. It is highly unjust to include them. But the remedy for the sort of abuse of discretion, spoken of by the Senator from Nebraska, is not to change the law, but to correct the order of the court in the particular case. The remedy is not to burn down your house to get rid of vermin, and we should not spoil the law in order to prevent an occasional abuse of discretion. There is a proper method provided for correcting abuses of discretion.

By such amendments as this one proposed by the Senator from Nebraska I am afraid we will do more damage to the law than will be justified by the injustices we correct. For this reason I feel that I must object to the unanimous-consent request, because I want to vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Montana and against the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to use this occasion to discuss this question of threats. I am not going to object to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, but I am going on the theory that, after his amendment shall have been agreed to, this amendment, which has been read, can be offered following it, and that the Senate will add this amendment, so as to accomplish in the end just what the Senator from Montana wanted to accomplish when he asked unanimous consent to vote on both amendments at the same time.

Very much has been said about this threat, and I think we have overestimated the necessity of putting that in the Federal law. As I have tried to say several times, this bill is to correct some of the things done mostly by inferior Federal district judges.

The harm of an injunction ninety-nine times out of one hundred is done and the injustice is completed within a few days after the restraining order is issued. Men are frightened into submission. Even if that be not true, in the great majority of instances the men are financially unable to carry their cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is because we have some such judges that this legislation is necessary. I do not think I need now go into any detail and call attention to some of the actual injunctions which have been issued. We have read many of them to the Senate. I have dozens more that I could add to the list if I wanted to do so. I have had them here on my desk. But I believe we have covered that ground. Now let us realize just what we are trying to do.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says that the way to correct the situation is to correct the order of the judge itself.

The only way to correct such an order is to take an appeal. But by the time such an appeal goes to the Supreme Court of the United States in most cases the backbones of the laboring men have been broken, their organizations practically destroyed. The damage has been done, and the evil has occurred. As was said in one of the cases by the judge, "The organization of the union is itself an unlawful act," and he enjoined it because it was in conflict, he said, with the antitrust laws of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator agrees, of course, that such a ruling was preposterous?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. REED. And the Circuit Court of Appeals would have said so beyond a doubt if the case had been taken to them, would they not?

Mr. NORRIS. They ought to have said so. I do not think they have always done so. In that case the Supreme Court set aside the finding of the lower court.

Mr. REED. Of course, everyone knew that they would do so.

Mr. NORRIS. But what happened in the meantime? Two or three years' time elapsed and the poor devils who were trying to improve their conditions in the mines were whipped completely. There was nothing left of them. They had nothing to fight for. The injunction issued by the district judge had in effect wiped them off the face of the earth.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not mean that the United Mine Workers of America went out of existence?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but they lost the strike a good many times. In the Hitchman case they lost out completely long before the Supreme Court had passed on the question.

Mr. REED. But the order said that the organization was unlawful.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. That order was to my mind preposterous.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. REED. It should have been set aside. It should have been appealed even more promptly than it was.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. REED. How can we prevent abuses of discretion by changing the law in this way?

Mr. NORRIS. This will prevent it, I think. In other words, the Senator from Pennsylvania, it seems to me, with due respect to him and his great ability, is in this position. He says, "I am in favor of an amendment which will enable somebody to get an injunction because a threat has been made." I offer an amendment and the only object on earth that I have in offering it, and the only effect of it is to say, "Yes; issue an injunction on account of a threat; but if you do so, you must not enjoin anybody who did not make the threat or commit any unlawful act." The Senator from Pennsylvania says, "No; we can not stand for that."

Mr. REED. What I am puzzled about is this: Here is a judge who makes a perfectly preposterous order which is contrary to the law as it now stands, if I understand the law. How are we going to reform that judge by merely restating what the law is to-day?

Mr. NORRIS. We are up against a difficult proposition.

Mr. REED. If he does not observe the law in one case he may not observe it in another case.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have such judges; and as long as judges are appointed as now, and as they probably will be long after I am gone, we will continually here and there have the same kind of judges. Why, some of the great mining corporations undoubtedly were themselves the very moving spirit that put upon the Federal bench for life the very man that issued such injunctions at their behest. There is no question about it. Political influence was sufficient on the part of many of the great corporations to name a Federal judge and, of course, to name him for life. Naturally, such corporations got the injunctions they wanted, as a rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to say a word in connection with a remark made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, who spoke about the correction of injunctional orders on appeal. We have endeavored in the framing of the bill to take care of the matter of appeals as best we possibly can; but no matter what we do about it, the appeal is no relief whatever, as the thing is all ended long before the appeal can be heard either one way or the other. Either the strike prevails or it does not prevail, so the matter of appeal is of no particular consequence.

This is the more important question. In practically all these cases the officers of the union are made defendants, and in many other cases the officers of the national organization are made defendants. They are all charged with being engaged in a conspiracy. When the injunction issues it is supposed that the judge has at least temporarily reached the conclusion that those people are all engaged in a conspiracy. A conspiracy is, in the public mind, a rather grave offense. So the matter of the issuance of an injunction becomes a part of the strategy of the strike. It is sought not for the purpose of bringing anybody before the court eventually and punishing them for contempt, but it is sought for the purpose of influencing public opinion. If only an injunction can be had against the national officers of the organization upon the ground that they are engaged in a conspiracy, there is a very great point made in the strategy of the strike.

Mr. REED. The Senator can readily see that if they are engaged in such a conspiracy the injunction is justified, but there ought to be proof that they are so engaged. If the Senator were on the bench and, I hope, if I were on the bench, we would not enjoin anybody as a conspirator without proof of the conspiracy. If there is a conspiracy, then the injunction ought to issue.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We are talking in the first place about the matter of threats. When threats are made we want to confine the proceeding to those who are responsible for the threats. That is what we are seeking to do.

Mr. REED. It seems to me the courts would do that anyway. They ought to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think they ought to do it; I am frank to concede that. But the courts have not always done it; and, as one man expressed it, if we are going to get any relief out of an injunction bill, we must make it crystal clear, so that no judge can get away from it. If we do not, a willing judge will get away from it.

Mr. REED. It seems to me the law is crystal clear right now that no injunction should issue without proof of the existence of such a conspiracy or threat by the person enjoined.

Mr. NORRIS. All that is true. All the amendment does is to confine the judge when he issues his injunction, so that he can not issue it against me, for instance, if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] is the man who makes the threat, unless I authorize the threat or unless I agree to it after it is made and with knowledge of it.

Mr. REED. Suppose the Senator from Nebraska were in a conspiracy to burn my house, and yet the Senator from Nebraska, although he was in the conspiracy, was wise enough not to say anything threatening, but some of his fellow conspirators did do it. Then ought not the injunction to go against the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The Senator has put a case where it ought to, but we are not talking about a conspiracy here. There is nothing in this proposal about conspiracy. The Senator is getting away from the question at issue. Here is the proposal. If the court issues an injunction, not because of the conspiracy but because somebody made a threat, then he must issue it against the men that made the threat.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; and that is what the amendment proposes, and nothing else.

Mr. REED. One of the conspirators makes a threat——

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; there are no conspirators in the case we are talking about. If he gets an injunction on the ground of conspiracy, and if the Senator proves that I am one of the conspirators, then I am bound by both the actions and threats of my coconspirators.

Mr. REED. I concede the Senator ought to be bound, but under the language of his proposed amendment I rather doubt it.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I would not be touched. It has no application to such a case. Just read the language.

Mr. REED. It seems to me it very clearly has application.

Mr. NORRIS. If the language was "where an injunction has been issued on the ground of conspiracy," and then followed by this language, it would be an entirely different proposition, but the language is "where an injunction has been issued because of a threat," so that then it must run against the men who made the threat.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from Nebraska said, in answer to the hypothetical case cited by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that in the case of a conspiracy all of the conspirators could be enjoined. I wonder if that is so in the light of section 5 of the bill as it has been agreed to. I read:

> SEC. 5. No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue a restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction upon the ground that any of the persons participating or interested in a labor dispute constitute or are engaged in an unlawful combination or conspiracy because of the doing in concert of the acts enumerated in section 4 of this act.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, we first take up section 4 and specifically enumerate a number of things for the doing of which no injunction shall be issued. Section 5 simply provides that those things which we have specifically permitted in section 4 shall not constitute a conspiracy when two or more of those people agree to do what we have already decided any one of them can do. Just go back to section 4 for a moment. Eventually I will get back to the case before us. I am now getting away from it, not because I want to but because Senators have led me away from it. Let me read section 4:

No court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction in any case involving or growing out of any labor dispute to prohibit any person or persons participating or interest in such dispute (as these terms are herein defined) from doing, whether singly or in concert, any of the following acts.

Section 5 says that the doing of those acts shall not be held by a court to be a conspiracy. In section 4 we already say they are legal and that no injunction shall be issued against anyone, even though there are several of them who have agreed to unite in any one of them. Let us see what they are.

(a) Ceasing or refusing to perform any work or to remain in any relation of employment.

(b) Becoming or remaining a member of any labor organization or of any employer organization—

That applies to the other side just as well—regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act.

That has reference to the "yellow-dog" contract.

(c) Paying or giving to or withholding from any person participating or interested in such labor dispute any strike or unemployment benefits or insurance, or other moneys or things of value;

(d) By all lawful means aiding any person participating or interested in any labor dispute who is being proceeded against in or is prosecuting any action or suit in any court of the United States or of any State;

(e) Giving publicity to the existence of, or the facts involved in, any labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence;

(f) Assembling peaceably to act or to organize to act in promotion of their interests in a labor dispute;

(g) Advising or notifying any person of an intention to do any of the acts heretofore specified;

(h) Agreeing with other persons to do or not to do any of the acts heretofore specified; and

(i) Advising, urging, or otherwise causing or inducing without fraud or violence the acts heretofore specified, regardless of any such undertaking or promise as is described in section 3 of this act.

Again referring to the "yellow-dog" contract.

Is there anybody who objects to any one of those recitals? Is there anything in any one of them that is unfair? This amendment simply provides that two or more laboring men who agree to do any one of the acts I have enumerated shall not be held to be guilty of a conspiracy. What is wrong about that, I ask any fair-minded man on earth? In any other case except a case involving a labor dispute one would be laughed out of court if he tried to charge a conspiracy on evidence as to any of the acts enumerated in the provisions I have read. Such a charge would apply nowhere and never has been made, so far as I know, except against men who toil, and, as a rule, against men who toil down in the bowels of the earth in the mines.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The hypothetical case stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania on which the Senator from Rhode Island predicates his question involves the commission of an unlawful act——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. Such as the destruction of property, which is a violation of a penal statute. Of course, if several persons should conspire to do that all the conspirators could be enjoined.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRATTON. The difference is that the acts enumerated in section 4 are perfectly legal.

Mr. NORRIS. We have declared them to be so, although it ought not to be necessary to do so.

Mr. BRATTON. It should not be necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not be in any other kind of a dispute except a labor dispute.

Mr. BRATTON. The hypothetical case presented to the Senator from Nebraska is an out-and-out case involving violation of a penal statute.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I do not think that section 4 or section 5 have any application to such a case as I have suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that is just what I said. I said I was going to enter upon that particular ground because the Senator led me there. He has talked about a conspiracy, when section 5 refers to a conspiracy, and that is what the Senator from Rhode Island read as an answer. I have been trying to show all this time that it has not anything more to do with the immediate question than last year's bird's nest; we are not talking about a conspiracy but about an illegal act.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator answer my question, which is, Why would not the language of his proposed amendment make it impossible for a Federal court to issue an injunction against those members of a conspiracy who had not actually made the threat?

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have answered the Senator's question several times. It has not any relation to a conspiracy. It simply says to the court, "If you issue an injunction on the ground that somebody has made a threat to commit an unlawful act, then you must confine your injunction to the man who made the threat or the man who committed the unlawful act." That is all it does.

Mr. REED. Then it prevents the issuance of an injunction against those conspirators who are silent.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. REED. It seems to me it does.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator assumes there are some conspirators; I am taking a case where there is no conspiracy.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. Let us assume that a group of individuals meet together at some common meeting place; that there is a spokesman; that all join in agreeing with the spokesman as to what shall be done, and the spokesman suggests the burning of a house or the destruction of some property; all join in; everybody there is agreed. Under the Senator's amendment, the question in my mind is whether those who attended that meeting and joined in its purposes and were in accord with the man who suggested the damage could be enjoined?

Mr. NORRIS. Again the Senator has put a case; let us take that case verbatim, as he puts it. What is the ground for an injunction on the statement the Senator has made? The ground is, under his own statement, that a conspiracy exists. It will be alleged in the petition and the evidence will go to show that certain men have conspired together. This amendment has not anything whatever to do with such a case. In it an injunction is sought on the ground that a conspiracy has been unearthed. This amendment only applies to a case where an injunction is sought against a man because he committed an unlawful act or threatened to commit an unlawful act.

Mr. HEBERT. I confess, Mr. President, that I can not see the distinction made by the Senator, although I followed him as carefully as I could.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if the case he puts is not entirely covered by the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska? It includes not only those who make the threat but those who approve or ratify it; and in the case he put, every man at the meeting who, as he says, joined in the thing would be approving the act.

Mr. HEBERT. But let me say to the Senator that in the case put not everybody made a threat. As I listened to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, the court may enjoin only him who made the threat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; the Senator has not paid attention to the amendment.

Mr. HEBERT. Let us have it read again then.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the part that applies to the suggestion of the Senator, and I have already read it:

> • • • an unlawful act or who actually authorizes the same or ratifies the same after actual knowledge thereof.

Mr. President, I intended——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The case put by the Senator from Rhode Island contemplates not only those who ratify it but those who join in it, because, according to the case he puts, they all agree to go along together.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say just a few words further. I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island did not have reference to the bridge or some other property that was going to be burned. Anyway, I want to say just a few words about what would happen if we entirely took away the right of the Federal court to issue an injunction to restrain somebody from burning that bridge in Texas. Suppose we prohibited the issuance of an injunction where threats are made to burn bridges, or, in the case suggested by the Senator, to burn houses or buildings, and the Federal courts had no authority therefore to issue an injunction, even though the threats to burn that famous bridge were mountain high, what would happen? What terrible calamity would overtake the country; what evil thing would happen to the community where that bridge is? Certain men have threatened to burn it; and here is a Federal judge 250 miles away who is perfectly willing to issue an injunction to restrain the act, but he can not do it because Congress has taken away his right. Suppose that to be the case—the bill does not so provide, but suppose it does—is the bridge going to be burned? Are there any officers in Texas? There is a legislature in Texas; there is a governor; there are sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, marshals, and deputies. I do not have the statute of Texas here, because I asked the clerk to get me a State statute but did not specify the State, and it so happens he got one from Pennsylvania; so I have the Pennsylvania statute; but I assume its provisions are very similar to those of the statute of Texas.

What would happen? What ought to happen? What is the right way to prevent the burning of that bridge? If the Senator from Rhode Island threatens me, do I go to a Federal court and get an injunction out against him prohibiting him from carrying out his threat? No one ever heard of such a thing; no such thing happens—unless I am a laboring man, belong to a union, and spend my life down in the earth or somewhere else toiling and working. Workers of that kind are the only ones who get hit by these injunctions on account of threats or illegal acts; no other individuals are hurt. At one end of the bridge, within 40 rods of it, perhaps, in Texas, lives a justice of the peace. One can go before him—he does not need to go 250 miles away to reach a Federal judge—and file an affidavit. The man against whom the affidavit is filed, who, it is alleged, had made threats, may be arrested and brought before the justice of the peace; the evidence will be taken; and if the justice finds that a threat has been made, he will require the defendant to put up a bond for his good appearance, generally with a specific statement that he will not commit the offense that he has threatened to commit. If he does not put up that bond he goes to jail, and he remains there until the next term of the higher court, and that court takes up the case; but whether he goes to jail or not, if the justice of the peace binds the defendant over and he gives bond, the case goes up, and the higher court tries it like any other case.

I said I obtained the statute of Pennsylvania. I do not suppose there is any doubt whatever but that there is a similar statute in every State in the Union. In addition to that, there are the State courts. Are we going to give jurisdiction to the Federal court to go into the State? If one has to have an injunction, let him go to his State court and get it; but he does not need to go to either place. Let me read the statute of Pennsylvania. Let us see what the Senator from Pennsylvania would do—whether he would have a man arrested and brought before a justice or whether he would go over a hundred miles away and get an injunction, without notice, restraining a number of men from burning that bridge.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I should like to tell the Senator what I would do.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. REED. In 30 years of practice, in one of the largest industrial districts in the country, I have always disapproved of the use of the injunction in labor matters. So far I have been able to persuade my clients not to ask for such injunctions; and in those 30 years of practice I have never once asked for or obtained any such injunction. I disapprove of them entirely. That is a direct answer to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not told me what he would do about the bridge.

Mr. REED. That is what I would do.

Mr. NORRIS. How would the Senator save the bridge?

Mr. REED. There are lots of ways of saving it without putting an impossible burden on the courts, Federal or State.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I am going to read what would be the method employed in the Senator's State.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If all the judges sitting on the Federal bench entertained the same views as the Senator from Pennsylvania, the abuse of the injunctive process would not exist.

Mr. NORRIS. And we would not be here with this bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There would be no such bill here as that now pending provided the Federal judges had the point of view the Senator from Pennsylvania has expressed.

Mr. NORRIS. I have the Pennsylvania statute of 1920. The statute was passed many years before that, but I suppose it is still on the statute books of Pennsylvania. I want to read a part of section 8086, the part that applies to the particular case, and also section 8087. Section 8086, so far as it applies to the question before us, reads as follows:

> Security to keep the peace: If any person shall threaten the person of another to wound, kill, or destroy him, or do him any harm in person or estate—> and the person threatened shall appear before a justice of the peace and attest, on oath or affirmation, that he believes that by such threatening he is in danger of being hurt in body or estate, such person so threatening as aforesaid shall be bound over, with one sufficient surety, to appear at the next sessions, according to law, and in the meantime to be on his good behavior and keep the peace toward all citizens of this Commonwealth.

That means his property, I take it—

The procedure is outlined in the next section:

> Justice to hold hearing: In all cases of surety of the peace the justice of the peace before whom such case is instituted shall, before he binds anyone over to the next term of the court of quarter sessions, and in the meantime to keep the peace, upon the oath of another, as provided by section 6 of the act of March 31, 1860 (Pamphlet Laws, 427), enter into a full hearing and investigation of the facts; and shall only bind over the defendant when the evidence shows, to the satisfaction of the justice, that the prosecutor's or prosecutrix's danger of being hurt in body or estate is actual, and that the threats were made by the defendant maliciously and with intent to do harm.

As I said before, I do not suppose there is a State in the Union but has a similar procedure. So, after all, these great big corporations that are running around following district judges to get injunctions without notice to anybody, to set aside constitutions and statutes and everything else and put in force a new schedule of law, are not suffering so badly. If somebody has made a threat to burn their bridge they can easily protect themselves and their property fully by recourse to the State statutes. But in order that there may be no question about it we have brought in this bill, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has offered an amendment, and I have agreed to accept it, in the belief that the Senate after accepting that amendment will agree to the modification which I have read, and which, in closing, I want to read again.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If I understand the Senator from Nebraska, it is his contention—happily supported to-day by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]—that it is against sound public policy to have the injunctive writ exclusively used against the workers of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. That is my belief; yes.

At the end, after agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana, which puts the word "threatened" into the law as well as actually "committed," I add this:

But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons making the threat or committing the unlawful act——

Now, listen to this:

Or who actually authorizes the same or ratifies the same after actual knowledge thereof.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will talk to the Senator privately about a suggested change in the wording.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to what seems to me an overlapping of provisions as between the proposal now made by the Senator from Nebraska and the language presently contained in section 6 of the bill, and to this proposition I should like to invite the particular attention of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

If I caught the purport and effect of the proposal which the Senator now makes providing additional language in subsection (a) on page 6 of the bill, he would limit the injunction to those who commit the unlawful act or to those who actually authorize it or ratify the act after knowledge.

Referring back to section 6 of the bill, I read:

No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

It seems to me that having already adopted the language just read, there is not very much for us to quarrel with respect to the amendment which is now suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. The only difference—and that would appear a slight one in practical operation—one provision is couched in terms of limitation upon the power of the court, and the other would seem to be couched in terms of limitation upon the jurisdiction of the court; but, as a practical matter, it seems to me just as broad as it is long. I therefore should have little objection to the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska, provided the bill is still to contain the language just read from section 6. It seems to me, however, that there is objection to both provisions.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] two or three times has put up to us the question of what might happen in case of conspiracy. The Senator from Nebraska answers that there is no conspiracy; that he assumes a case in which there is no conspiracy, and he says to the Senator from Pennsylvania, "You assume a case in which there is a conspiracy."

Let me say that there may be a conspiracy. If there is no conspiracy, then, from my standpoint, there is no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. If, however, there is a conspiracy, then I am quite convinced that the language proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would make inoperative the powers that we think we are leaving in the Federal courts with respect to injunctions. It seems to me that in those cases in which there is a conspiracy, that language is inapt in its present form.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I am happy to yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I have been interested in the case stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I do not understand that this language would militate against that situation.

Let us suppose that a strike is in progress; and it is going along in a perfectly orderly way. No violation of property has been threatened, or destruction of property committed; but growing out of a peaceable strike, a group, perhaps, animated by passion or heat of the moment assemble in a hall, as the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Rhode Island illustrated, and they there agree to destroy property, although they do it in furtherance of a strike which has been peaceful and peaceable up until that time. Even under the amendment of the Senator from Montana and the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, everybody participating in that unlawful undertaking or present in the hall in which the agreement to that end was effected could be singled out and enjoined, because there is where the illegal phase of the whole proceeding transpired.

This amendment would not limit the power of the court to enjoin effectively everyone participating in the illegal phase of the strike, but it would restrain the court from reaching back and enjoining others who have participated in the strike in a perfectly peaceable and law-abiding way. It separates those engaged in the unlawful phase of the undertaking from those engaged in the lawful aspects of it, permitting the court to seize those engaged in the unlawful part and control them, while leaving the others alone. I think that is the effect of the two amendments considered together.

Mr. STEIWER. Upon what theory would we say that everyone in the hall can be reached? Would it be upon the theory that he actually authorized the unlawful act?

Mr. BRATTON. No; that he was present and ratified it, indeed, that he was a party to the agreement.

Mr. STEIWER. But, Mr. President, he would ratify it after it was committed, when he had knowledge of it.

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, no; oh, no! If he is present in the hall and is acting in concert with the man who says, "I am going to destroy certain property," he is a party to the undertaking, and can be restrained; but under the two amendments the court can not go back to the inception of the strike and make others parties to the suit and enjoin them on the theory that the destruction is a part of the strike, which has been peaceable and law-abiding up to that point.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, if the application of this amendment would be as indicated by the Senator from New Mexico, I should be entirely in accord with him, but I still am unconvinced upon the proposition that there is any way to reach the man who does not actually authorize the act or actually ratify it. The language in section 6 requires "clear proof" of authorization or ratification.

Mr. BRATTON. Suppose 50 men are in the hall, counseling together, conferring with one another, and one in the group utters the words, "We are going to destroy the property," and the others acquiesce in such declaration by their presence there, by their concert of action. Does the Senator doubt at all that a court of equity could enjoin all of them?

Mr. STEIWER. I do not doubt that under the law as it presently exists a court of equity could enjoin all of those present in the meeting; and I assume that the Senator is in accord with the idea that in the case just stated by him the court ought to have power to enjoin all those present.

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEIWER. I am merely attempting to say that under the language of the proposal made by the Senator from Nebraska I have a most serious doubt whether the court would retain the power to enjoin those who are actually implicated in the offense.

Mr. BRATTON. I did not so understand the Senator. Of course, all of those in the hall who are engaged in the unlawful undertaking should be enjoined. I think all of us will agree to that; but we should not reach back 30 or 60 days before that time and join in the suit others who were parties to the original strike, which had been perfectly legal up to that time.

Mr. STEIWER. If I may interrupt, I am thoroughly in agreement with the statement just made by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. It is my understanding that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would accomplish that end. We ought to segregate those whose conduct is peaceable and law-abiding from those who may, through heat or passion, indulge in an unlawful undertaking, even though it grows out of a strike that is peaceable at its start; and I understand that the amendment would do that. If not, it should be couched in language which would accomplish that end.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he agrees with the construction that has been put upon his amendment by the Senator from New Mexico? I had not understood it quite that way.

Mr. NORRIS. I was busily engaged with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I did not hear what the latter part of this debate brought out. The last I heard, if I may be permitted to say so, was something that rather shocked me, because the Senator from Oregon said there would not be any way to reach the fellow who did not actually authorize or did not actually commit the act of violence; and it struck me right off that I did not suppose we wanted to reach that fellow. He is innocent. Is that what the Senator has reference to?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; that is where the question comes in. The Senator from New Mexico says that if a man is in a hall where a speech is made insisting that they go and burn a bridge, and all that sort of thing, as I understand it, if he, by his presence, acquiesces in it without openly objecting to it, then he is subject to the injunction. Am I right in that?

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, no; the Senator puts an interpretation that I did not intend. I intended to say that if a strike is in process, and it is going along in a perfectly peaceable and law-abiding way; that a group of the strikers, animated by heat and passion, assemble in a hall and agree there to do an unlawful act, to destroy property, they should be enjoined. But you should not join with them in the suit others who are engaged in the strike, but who are confining themselves to perfectly law-abiding, peaceable methods. You should segregate those who are about to commit an unlawful act, who are about to destroy property, and confine the injunction to them, leaving out of the suit and leaving untouched by the writ others who are striking but who are not disposed to resort to unlawful methods.

I did say that if there are a hundred in a hall, and they are acting in concert in the threat to destroy property, they would not all have to say severally and separately, "I am not going to destroy the property, but if one speaks the words, "We are going to destroy property," and it is clear that they are acting in concert, engaged in a common undertaking, designed to commit an offense through concert of action, then, under the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, there would be no difficulty in joining all of them in the suit and restraining all of them from doing that which they had set out to accomplish through joint action. That is my understanding of the effect of the amendment. That is the way it would work in operation.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I am entirely in accord with the proposal if it means what the Senator from New Mexico thinks it means. The Senator from New Mexico has just stated, in effect, if not in terms, that under the conditions of the hypothetical case stated by him authorization for the unlawful act may be implied from the circumstances. Do I properly understand the Senator?

Mr. BRATTON. I think so.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is true; but the difficulty with the language proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is that it leaves open no opportunity to indulge in any implications, because his language is, as I recall it and as I understood it, "or who actually authorizes the same, or ratifies the same after actual knowledge thereof." All I was attempting to do in addressing myself to this matter was to question the propriety of the language used in the amendment.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I am glad to get the views of the Senator. I think the amendment is a very wholesome one, because up until now it has been a common practice throughout the country to enjoin everybody connected with a strike if a part of the strikers, in the course of the strike, forgetting themselves for the moment, employ unlawful methods.

To illustrate: A strike is declared on the 1st of February by the workers engaged in a certain line of industry. It goes along peaceably and quietly and in a law-abiding manner for 30 days, and then, under the driving force of circumstances a small number of the strikers join together in an unlawful undertaking growing out of the strike.

The common practice is to join everybody connected with the strike from its inception on the ground that they conspired to effect a strike, and that as a part of the conspiracy, and growing out of the conspiracy, some of the conspirators are engaged in an unlawful undertaking; that when a conspiracy is established, every conspirator is bound by the words and acts of each and every coconspirator.

The effect of this amendment is to abrogate this general rule, to abridge the effect of an injunction in the circumstances we are discussing by taking from the court the power to issue an injunction against everybody connected with the strike, but to limit it to those and only those who are engaged in the unlawful undertaking.

Mr. STEIWER. Does not the Senator feel that the practice of courts in issuing an order which relates back and includes in its operations innocent people is a wholly indefensible practice?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes, I do; and that is why the Senator from Oregon and I both join in supporting the principle embodied in the amendment, though we, perhaps, do not agree on the exact effect of the language contained in it.

Mr. STEIWER. Does the Senator think that if there is such a judicial degeneracy in the bosom of the court, we are going to make him a just judge by anything we do here?

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator speaks of the degeneracy of the judge. The difficulty with that is that where a judge, through erroneous judgment, or through degeneracy, or for any other reason, issues one of these sweeping injunctions, it is too late to correct the injury thereafter. It must be made impossible for that type of a judge to do that sort of thing, in order to protect mankind.

Of course, one judge might grant a more sweeping injunction than another; but when he grants a sweeping injunction, even though it is unsound and untenable in equity, it does no good to talk about it afterwards. If he has driven workers off the property, compelled them to vacate houses, compelled them to do thus and so, it does no good months afterward to point out the inequities of the injunction. The remedy is to make it impossible for a judge to do that sort of thing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has been a judge, and a very able one.

Mr. BRATTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the Senator whether, under the law as it now is, regardless of the bill before us, he thinks there is any warrant for the issuance of an injunction against every member of a union because a few of them have gone into a conspiracy which threatens the destruction of property?

Mr. BRATTON. No; I do not.

Mr. REED. In other words, under the present law, a chancellor is not justified in using this weapon of injunction against those innocent persons who are not in the conspiracy to destroy property?

Mr. BRATTON. That is my belief.

Mr. REED. If certain judges have disregarded the present law and have issued such sweeping injunctions, what reason have we to think that they will not similarly disregard the law as it is declared in this bill?

Mr. BRATTON. Because judges might differ as to the general doctrines of equity in their application to different cases; but if there is a specific statute confronting a judge, taking away from him jurisdiction to grant an injunction of a certain type and removing all room for argument, it is reasonable to assume that the judge, who might otherwise grant a more sweeping injunction, would say, "Independently of statute, and in equity, an injunction of that kind should be issued, but since the statute limits my authority, since there are express words limiting it or taking it away, I can not grant an injunction which I otherwise would grant."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I have understood the Senator in the construction he places on this proposed amendment, it is merely declaratory of what I understand the law now to be.

Mr. BRATTON. What it should be.

Mr. REED. What it actually is, although it is disregarded frequently, or sometimes, by certain judges.

Mr. BRATTON. Yes.

Mr. REED. What I can not make out is how we are helping the worker in any way merely by declaring a second time that the law is as we know it to be to-day.

Mr. BRATTON. We are helping him in this wise: A judge may issue a sweeping injunction to-day against everybody connected with a union, and that may be wrong; it may not be justified under existing law. But the only way it can be corrected is to appeal and have the case reversed after the harm has all been done. It is errors of judgment on the part of judges in interpreting existing rules of equity which this bill would prevent.

Mr. REED. I confess I can not see how reiteration of the present law is going to make judges virtuous who are not virtuous to-day.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me say this: The Supreme Court of the United States held that the injunction in the Hitchman case was improvidently issued. There the harm was done through a wrong concept of the trial judge, believing that in equity he had the right to issue the injunction which he did issue. That caused the harm there. The Supreme Court later reversed the case, but it did not correct the harm. Does the Senator think that that judge would grant a similar injunction hereafter in the face of this bill if it should be enacted into law?

Mr. REED. I am quite sure he would not grant a similar injunction hereafter, in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court. That is just as effective as a statute. I do not think any Federal judge whose attention was called to that case would ever make that mistake again. If he did, he ought to be impeached.

Mr. BRATTON. Trial judges do make mistakes of judgment, they grant injunctions from time to time based upon different facts presented to them, and they are frequently reversed, the higher courts holding that the injunction should not have been granted; but in each case the harm is achieved, it is completed, it has worked its ravages, before the appellate court corrects the mistake, and this bill is designed to lay down a mandate to judges, confining the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes. It sets up mileposts for judges to follow, rather than leaving them in the whole field of equity, each judge deciding for himself what he is justified in doing in equity.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is to be construed as it has been construed by the Senator from New Mexico, I can not see that any reasonable person could dissent from it. It does not seem to me, however, that if it is to be construed in that way, it is necessary, because it merely is declaratory of the law as it exists to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that many of the provisions of the bill declare the law as it is to-day. For instance, subdivision (e), giving publicity to the facts involved in any "labor dispute, whether by advertising, speaking, patrolling, or by any other method not involving fraud or violence."

Mr. REED. We are not talking about that section at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes, we are. We are speaking, of course, about the injunction which shall be issued under the provisions of section 7, but the Senator says we ought not to put that in because that is the law now. But we have put a lot of things in the bill which are the law now.

Mr. REED. I quite see that; but I do not see the use of it. We do not make it any more the law by saying it again.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We have done it, and we think it will have some influence upon the action of judges when we declare the law. So there is no sound objection to this particular amendment offered upon the ground that it is the law already, because we have declared in a number of instances in the bill what is the law already.

Mr. REED. If that is what the amendment does, I do not object to it very much, merely because it is a reiteration of what we now know the law to be. I was apprehensive, however, that the purpose of offering it was to change the law. If it is not, of course I do not intend to prolong the discussion further.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I would say the purpose of it is to change what some judges have said the law to be. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself would both agree that the law ought to be as it is set forth in this amendment; but the trouble is that a lot of judges—not one, not two, but innumerable Federal judges—have issued practically blanket injunctions, and they have issued them against an organization because some one individual in the organization, who might not have been what we would call a legitimate member of the organization, has made some threatening statement.

Mr. REED. We need not debate the propriety of that. I agree that it ought not to be done—that no one ought to be enjoined for any act unless he has threatened or joined or acquiesced in some one else's threat.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will familiarize himself with the decisions in numbers of these cases he will find, regardless of whether or not it has been one individual or two individuals, when as a matter of fact the labor organizations came into court and disclaimed absolutely in their testimony that the man or men spoke for them in the slightest degree, yet the courts have gone on and issued injunctions because of the threats made by some individual.

As I said to the Senator the other day, it is rather a common practice that has grown up in the country for large employers of labor to employ some detective and have him join a labor organization. Then this man, not at the instance many times of the employer, but because of the fact that he wants to make his employer think he is earning his money, goes out and makes or causes to be made some inflammatory statement. Upon the basis of such a statement an injunction is sought and a lot of innocent people are cited into court and are punished and perhaps even confined in jail.

The purpose of the provision now before us is to let the courts know that the Congress of the United States has said that in its opinion this is the law, and that it shall not be permissible any longer for the courts to follow the practice they have been following in the past. It is only a question whether or not the Senator from Pennsylvania believes that no man should be enjoined unless he himself is a party to the threat.

Mr. REED. Or makes himself a party to it or approves it. Surely I agree to that.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator agrees to that, then there can not be any legitimate opposition to the amendment, it seems to me, because it is stating what in common justice ought to be the law and what many of the courts have claimed is not the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Montana proposes, on page 6, line 7, before the word "committed," to insert the words "threatened or," and in line 8, after the word "be," to insert "committed or," so it will read:

(a) That unlawful acts have been threatened or committed and will be committed or continued unless restrained.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Inasmuch as I want my amendment to be considered in conjunction with the one just adopted, I read its exact language. Strike out the semicolon at the end of line 8 and insert it just after the language we have just agreed to; after the word "restrained," in line 8, insert a comma and these words:

But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons making the threat or committing the unlawful act or actually authorizing or ratifying the same after actual knowledge thereof.

I had the understanding that the two amendments were going to be acted on together. Inasmuch as the Senate is not going to agree to them in that way, I wish now to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Montana was just agreed to. If the amendment which I have just offered is agreed to, I shall then withdraw that motion, but if my amendment is rejected, then I shall insist upon my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I should like to make one or two further observations in connection with this matter. I confess that if this language is to be applied in the way the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] has suggested, I would be hearily in accord with its adoption. But it seems to me there is involved in this proposal, and also in section 6 of the bill as it stands, a situation to which we ought to give our very critical attention. I realize the good purpose and the high motives which cause the proposal to be made. I also believe, if I may be indulged in holding a belief in respect to these matters, that we have not fully considered the result of that which we propose to do.

We have assumed that in every labor dispute the injunction will be sought by the employer against the employee. I know that in most instances that is the actual occurrence, but it is entirely conceivable, and sometimes it has happened in the past, that the employees seek injunctive relief against the employer. Let me invite the attention of the Senate to a case with which many are very familiar; I refer to the clerks' case against the Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co.

In that case the employees obtained injunctive relief under the provisions of the railway labor act of 1926. The relief they obtained was against the interference of the railroad company with the employees' right of designating representation of their own choosing. The thing they asserted was that the railroad company had sought by intimidation or coercion to bring about the creation of another organization and recognition of agents or representatives who were not in fact agents and representatives of the employees of the railroad company. The contention of the employees in that case was sustained. It was not only sustained by the lower court and upon appeal to the circuit court of appeals, but was sustained in the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision was written last year by Chief Justice Hughes.

I want to ask Members of the Senate whether or not it is the desire here to repeal by implication the beneficial provisions of the act of 1926, and if not, then what remedy is left to the employees in case of interference or intimidation, as the case may be, upon the part of the employer? What chance would there be for injunctive relief, if the court is bound to find, as a jurisdictional basis for the injunction, that unlawful acts have been committed, or that they are threatened, so far as that is concerned? The relief granted was not based upon unlawful acts; it was based on interference and coercion.

I do not understand there was anything unlawful in the action of the railroad company in the clerks' case. There was an invasion of the right of the employees, it is true; there was an attempt upon the part of the railroad company to deny to the employees the full right of association and the very important right of being represented by agents of their own choosing. So far as I am concerned, I would like to see that right of the employees maintained and would like to know that it may be protected in a court of equity.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator afraid that, having agreed to this amendment, thereafter the employees will not be allowed to select some one of their own choosing?

Mr. STEIWER. I am not afraid of that, Mr. President. It is not a question of fear upon my part. It is a question of conviction growing out of my understanding of the language.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think, if this amendment is agreed to, that always hereafter the laboring man will not be allowed to select anybody of his own choosing?

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no; I do not think that, and I did not say that. I do think, though, that if the employer seeks to invade that right of the employee, there will be no remedy by injunction in behalf of the employee. That is what I said, and I challenge anyone to controvert that——

Mr. NORRIS. I controvert it.

Mr. STEIWER. I challenge anyone to controvert it successfully if he will examine the language before us and compare it with the beneficial provisions which are contained in the act of 1926. How would the employees point to unlawful acts? Where would they point even to a threat of an unlawful act? If the court should construe the language differently from the way I construe it—as the court may very well do, because there is nothing infallible about my judgment in the matter—how, then, would the court make its injunction order effective in behalf of the employee? Who would be enjoined by the order of the court? Would it be one superintendent, the man who was guilty of the unlawful act? Would it be one special agent or one depot agent? In the clerks' case to which I have referred the whole organization was enjoined, the railroad company itself was enjoined, and the most sweeping effect was given to the provisions of the act of 1926. Finally the court required, as a condition of the vacation of that injunction order, that the railroad company purge itself by ceasing to recognize those who were not the actual representatives of the employees and required the railroad company to recognize those who had been selected by the employees as their agents.

I am thoroughly in accord with the general expression made here that a court ought not, in issuing an injunction order and in designating those enjoined, to go back a month or two, as was suggested by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], and include as parties a lot of innocent people who were not involved in anything that was unlawful and who possibly had not even thought of making a threat against anybody. I am thoroughly in accord with that. But it seems to me further consideration ought to be given to the language and that we should find a way to safeguard the rights of the employees in courts of equity with respect to injunction processes without adopting language that is so sweeping that the courts would lose the power to do that which was done upon behalf of the employees in the clerks' case to which I referred a little while ago.

The inclusion in line 6 of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in my opinion, immeasurably strengthens the good purposes of the bill. The inclusion of the language in line 8 as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], if it could do what he proposes for it, would also, in my opinion, strengthen the provisions of the bill. But I still insist that the language in that proposal embraces too much territory and that it goes so far in limiting the injunctive relief to an order against the person who actually commits or threatens the commission of an unlawful act and to the person who actually authorizes or ratifies that act that the relief upon behalf of the employees will be most severely restricted and that we will in effect and by implication make a substantial modification of the act of 1926.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has, I think, built up an entirely imaginary case. There is no basis for his conclusion, at least none based upon the Texas case. That was a case in which the railway clerks sought an injunction against the Southern Pacific Railway Co. to enjoin that company from interfering with the clerks respecting their self-organization and the designation of representatives of their own choice. That is all there was to that case. It was an action against a single company by the clerks' organization or representatives of the clerks' organization.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. If the Senator will refer to section 6, he will note that—

> No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States.

All I am attempting to suggest is that if the injunctive process shall be limited to those who actually commit an unlawful act or threaten to do so the injunction will have to be against the agents of the railroad company and not against the company itself, because I believe that the term "organization" would include the company almost in express terms.

Mr. BLAINE. It seems to me that a corporation can function only through its officers and agents. A corporation can not itself speak; it has no life other than a corporate life; it has no voice and can only act or refuse to act through its officers and agents. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to pursue this matter, if I may be permitted to do so, until I conclude respecting the decision of Judge Hutcheson in the Texas case. That was the action about which the Senator built this imaginary situation that might happen. I wanted to point out that that case had reference, as I have said, only to an injunction to restrain the railroad company from interfering with the right of the clerks to self-organization and to choose representatives. That was under the railway labor act of 1926, and that particular provision I desire to read into the RECORD at this point.

Mr. WHEELER. Before the Senator gets through will he let me——

Mr. BLAINE. Let me read the quotation while I have the matter in mind:

> Representatives, for the purpose of this act, shall be designated by the respective parties in such manner as may be provided in their corporate organization or unincorporated association, or by other means of collective action, without interference, influence, or coercion exercised by either party over the self-organization or designation of representatives by the other.

It was under that provision of the railway labor act that the injunction was sought and obtained, the injunction providing against interference with the right of the employees under a substantive law, and permitting the employees to exercise their choice in the selection of representatives. That clearly does not sustain the conclusions to which the Senator has come in his discussion of this question.

Mr. STEIWER. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the fact that the only way a corporation can be represented is through its agent. If the agent does something that is not authorized by the corporation, the corporation can not at the present time be enjoined. The only time it could be enjoined, the only occasion when the railroad employees could enjoin it, would be when the agent of the corporation was doing something that he was authorized to do by the corporation itself.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that the principal is liable only for acts which are authorized?

Mr. WHEELER. I mean acts which the agent is doing in the ordinary scope of his employment.

Mr. REED. That is different.

Mr. WHEELER. The scope of his authority—that is the way in which I meant to make the reference—but this case is entirely different from what the Senator contends. All we are contending with reference to the labor unions is that the labor unions shall not be enjoined because of the fact that somebody belonging to a labor organization does something that he is not authorized to do or something that is not within the scope of his employment.

There is absolutely nothing to the Senator's argument to the effect that this is going to affect the laboring people or to keep them from enjoining some corporation. They do not want to enjoin any corporation and they do not want to enjoin any individual unless that corporation or individual is actually the one that is causing the unlawful act. We do not find, let me say, any labor organization complaining about this bill. As a matter of fact, I think every labor organization in the United States that has had its lawyers scan it is in favor of the bill, and they are entirely familiar, let me say to the Senator from Oregon, with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. Now, if I may intrude upon the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. BLAINE. Unless the Senator has a question to ask me, I yield the floor.

Mr. STEIWER. I want to ask one question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well.

Mr. STEIWER. Does the Senator contend that the phrase "association or organization" is applicable only to an employees' association or an employees' organization and is not applicable to an employers' association or an employers' organization? In other words, is this bill to be construed as working one way only or does it work as to both employer and employee without discrimination?

Mr. BLAINE. I can conceive of no case where an employee would bring an action under this act along the line the Senator has suggested. The action would be brought against the employees or their association or their organization. There are no employees going to bring any action under this act against the employer in any labor dispute as defined in this act.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true, Mr. President. The basis of his right would be either the transportation act of 1926 or some other act, but this measure defines the jurisdiction of the court. Regardless of what the right of the employee may be, if Congress by this bill defines the jurisdiction of the court so that the relief of the former act can not be accorded, how, then, could the laborer hope to get any injunctive relief in any case?

Mr. BLAINE. It is a very simple case—the Texas case involving the railroad clerks. They have certain rights under substantive law; those rights can be enforced only through an equity proceeding; and there is no penalty imposed by the railway labor act against the violation of the provision I just read, and that is the only provision that is of any great consequence, at least in this discussion. There is no remedy by which the employees may recover damages; the only remedy they have is by injunctive process; and they would allege that there is no remedy at law. To me it seems very clear that the subject the Senator is discussing is entirely separate and apart from the railway labor act. I can not see how it is applicable to this proposed act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I want to ask the Senator a question. I am greatly moved by what the Senator from Oregon says. I can see that there might come a great injustice. He speaks of organizations of employers and employees' organizations. One of them consists of the coal-mine operators, we will say, in the United States, and the other of the laboring men working for them. The Senator from Oregon wants to know whether we propose to give the coal-mine operators and coal combinations the same right that we propose to give to the laboring men. That is a serious question. The Senator from Wisconsin must not cast it aside without due consideration, because these great monopolistic combinations control property running into the billions in value; and are we going to turn them over to the tender mercies of a few fellows down in the earth who are digging coal, and not give them the right to commence in the Federal courts an action for an injunction to enable them to obtain their rights? Why, before we get through we will have deprived these large corporations of their rights under the Constitution; we will have nullified all the provisions of the Constitution. We ought to hesitate before we take away from these suffering companies the blessed right to have an injunction issued by a Federal judge, holding office for life, who, perhaps, forsooth, has obtained his job upon the recommendation of the very men and the very corporations who are asking the injunctions at his hands. We ought to be careful and see that we do not take away from that judge the right to make good to those who set him on a pedestal, made him a tyrant for life, and a monarch of all he surveys. We have got to be careful.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have concluded my statement, and I am quite sure that there is no logical argument by which the Senator from Oregon can construe the provisions of section 6 to deny the working men any rights they may have under any substantive law, either statutory or courtmade; certainly not with respect to the substantive law written into the railway labor act.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, an effective answer can be made to the last suggestion in just one sentence. In the railway clerks' case there was no unlawful act; there was not even the threat of an unlawful act. The remedy sought by the employees was based merely upon a coercion by the employers and the denial of the employees' right to be represented by agents of their own choosing. If that right is asserted again in a court of the United States after the enactment of this bill the court can not issue an injunction in their behalf, because the jurisdiction of the court will depend upon a finding that there is an unlawful act or the threat of an unlawful act, and the remedy provided or implied in the act of 1926, in my humble judgment, will be gone. I do not care now to pursue that suggestion further.

I should like, however, in view of the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] a little while ago that he was in favor of the effort here made, to say that I also am in favor of it. I shall not permit myself to be dissuaded from voting for this bill merely because some of the details may not meet my own ideas of what the legislation ought to be. I shall be induced to vote for the bill because of my antipathy toward the antiunion contract; because of my entire willingness to see the National Legislature go so far as it may constitutionally go to curtail the use of that device in industrial disputes. I shall be induced to vote for the bill because of my entire willingness to place in the law limitations upon the power of the Federal courts so that the abuses complained of may be abruptly stopped.

Mr. President, having made that declaration, let me add, in utter good nature, that I regard the statement just made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] as wholly unfair to me. He assumed, apparently in all seriousness, that I had spoken for the coal operators and said ironically that we ought to give greater consideration to the large coal-mining operators, and he also said ironically that he was impressed with my contention. Let me say, if it is necessary to say it, Mr. President, that at no time did I hint that anything should be accorded to the coal operators or any other operators or employers in this country, nor did I say anything that would fairly imply such a result. The only concern that I voiced here is concern lest rights may be taken away from employees by language which we may improvidently use. I asked the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, it is true, whether he regarded the bill as working both ways, and that question was pertinent because most of the discussion heretofore has concerned injunctions obtained by employers against employees; and I was trying to direct the discussion to certain considerations that affect the right of employees themselves in their effort to obtain injunctions in proper cases against the employer. I say, therefore, that the ironical jest of the Senator from Nebraska is unfair to me, and yet I have no disposition to answer it in kind. The language which I employed, the sentiments which I have expressed are known to all Senators in this Chamber at this time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to echo what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has just said. This is a 2-edged sword that we are dealing with; and I am afraid there will be many a workingman who will not thank the sponsors of this bill for section 6 or for the section that we are now discussing.

In effect section 6 changes the law of agency in any action arising out of a labor dispute, either in equity or at law. The words "association or organization" in section 6 were probably meant by the sponsors to apply only to labor organizations; but under any fair reading of that section the court will hold that they apply similarly to any employer who is incorporated, or to any association of employers; and some one bringing a suit against an employer some day because of high-handed and outrageous acts of corporate officers will find his suit defeated because he has been unable to prove authorization by the corporation itself.

I think it is only fair to give warning now that this is a 2-edged sword, that this gun is loaded at both ends, and we may be taking away very substantial rights from employees when we are only thinking about limiting the unfair use of the injunctive process.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I implore my brethren not to waste time over the idea that this bill is going to curtail the rights of some workingman. May I suggest that an academic argument as to the effect of a gun loaded at both ends in a United States Federal court, one end of which may do incalculable harm unto a laboring man, is an argument with which we need not concern ourselves very seriously at the present time.

Of course, I can understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] would bring to us here a bill the purpose of which undoubtedly is to prevent the individual who is working by himself, and who has neither power nor money nor influence, from obtaining an injunction against the coal barons or the railroad companies or some combination of employers; but, sir, I think we waste our time in dealing with a subject of that sort.

Let us go on and pass this bill. I recognize the difficulties in the way ultimately of having it administered as we would like to have it administered; but, sir, if it is nothing more than a gesture by the United States Senate, if it is nothing more than an endeavor as a deterrent to a United States court, let us pass this bill at least and put ourselves upon record as against the inhuman and outrageous injunctions that have been granted in the past against workingmen; and let us not worry ourselves in the slightest about the injunctions that workingmen might, forsooth, have at some far day in the future against their employers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The amendment was agreed to, as follows:

On page 6, line 8, after the word "restrained," insert a comma and the words:

But no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued on account of any threat or unlawful act excepting against the person or persons making the threat or committing the unlawful act or actually authorizing or ratifying the same after actual knowledge thereof.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in view of the discussion which has taken place here in the last 15 minutes, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an opinion given by a workingman at one time when he said that he understood that a court of equity was called a chancery court because, he said, the workingman never had a chance in that court.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLAINE was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLAINE to the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, viz: Add a new paragraph to section 8, to read as follows:

"(b) If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person directly or indirectly employed by him in connection with industrial relations has incited, promoted, or encouraged the labor dispute giving rise to the proceedings or any unlawful acts in connection therewith, all proceedings hereunder shall be suspended and any restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative until a hearing and determination has been had to determine the facts with respect to such allegations, and the court shall thereupon require that issue be joined and that a hearing thereon shall be immediately held.

"Testimony relating to such issue shall be taken in the same manner as is taken in equity proceedings within the jurisdiction of said court.

"After the taking of such testimony, if the court finds against the complainant on the issue joined the court shall make a finding of fact and shall assess against the complainant, and the defendants shall recover threefold the loss, expense, and damage caused by the issuance of such restraining order or temporary injunction, together with all reasonable costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee, incurred in the action instituted by complainants, and where there is more than one defendant, the amount assessed and recovered shall be apportioned among the defendants according to their respective interests as may be shown in said proceeding, and any restraining order or temporary injunction issued in the action instituted by complainants shall be dissolved as a part of the judgment for damages and costs on the special issue joined.

"A review of such findings and the judgment rendered in such matter may be had in the same manner as is now provided for a review in equity proceedings of which said court has jurisdiction."

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, there was addressed to the Vice President by Mr. Paul Howland, on behalf of the American Bar Association, a letter in reference to the pending bill, which I ask to have incorporated in the proceedings of to-day in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

CLEVELAND, February 20, 1932.

Re S. 935

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,

Vice President of the United States,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have been advised that S. 935 will be up for consideration by the Senate on Tuesday, the 23d of this month. We feel that the position taken by the American Bar Association with reference to legislation of this character should be called to the attention of the Senate.

This position of the American Bar Association is evidenced by the formal action taken at its annual meeting at Memphis in 1929, and reported in volume 54 at page 93 of its annual report. This action consisted of the approval of the following resolution:

"That the association authorize continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof."

The full report of the committee touching upon this subject will be found at page 373 of said annual report.

Again, in the annual report of the American Bar Association, volume 55 for the year 1930, on page 68, the association adopted the following recommendation of the committee on jurisprudence and law reform:

"Your committee recommends continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof, adhering in this respect to the instructions of the association at its Memphis meeting in 1929."

Again, on page 70, the association adopted the following recommendation with reference to S. 2496, then known as the Shipstead bill:

"Your committee recommends the defeat of S. 2496, known as the Shipstead bill, limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts sitting in equity or labor disputes, and fixing the public policy in relation thereto, on the ground that it is legislation with reference to a particular class and not uniform in its operation; that it surrounds the courts with so many limitations and conditions that it destroys the judicial power and renders the court helpless to restrain unlawful acts until after the damage has been done."

At the annual meeting of the American Bar Association held at Atlantic City in September, 1931, the committee on jurisprudence and law reform reported to the association upon this general subject, as follows:

"Your committee will continue its opposition to all legislation limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof, adhering strictly to the instructions of the association at Memphis in 1929 and at Chicago in 1930."

Yours respectfully,

PAUL HOWLAND,

Chairman Committee on Jurisprudence and Law Reform of the American Bar Association.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 1, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Francis J. Hurney, of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

We pray Thee, O Almighty and Eternal God of Might, Wisdom, and Justice, through whom authority is rightly administered, laws are enacted, and judgment decreed, assist with Thy Holy Spirit of counsel and fortitude the President of these United States, that his administration may be conducted in righteousness and be eminently useful to Thy people, over whom he presides, by encouraging due respect for virtue and religion, by a faithful execution of the laws in justice and mercy, and by great charity and devotion toward all those who to-day are in dire need. Let the light of Thy divine wisdom direct all the deliberations of this national body and shine forth in all the proceedings and laws framed for our rule and government, so that they may tend to the preservation of peace, the promotion of national happiness, the increase of industry, sobriety, and useful knowledge, and perpetuate to us the blessings of equal liberty.

We recommend likewise to Thy unbounded mercy all our fellow citizens throughout these United States, that they may be blessed in the knowledge and sanctified in the observance of Thy most holy law, that they may be preserved in union and in that peace which the world can not give, and after enjoying the blessings of this life be admitted to those which are everlasting. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 27, 1932, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

On February 20, 1932:

H. R. 6304. An act to transfer Lavaca County from the Houston division to the Victoria division of the southern judicial district of Texas.

On February 23, 1932:

H. R. 81. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Catawissa Railroad Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Catawissa, Pa.; and

H. R. 7247. An act authorizing the Rhode Island State Board of Public Roads and the State Highway Department of the State of Connecticut to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Pawcatuck River near the location of the present Broad Street Bridge between Westerly, R. I., and Stonington, Conn.

On February 24, 1932:

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis.

On February 27, 1932:

H. R. 9203. An act to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

EMERGENCY ROAD BILL

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Arthur M. Hyde, gave out a statement, appearing in all of the newspapers this morning, upbraiding the House of Representatives for passing the emergency road construction bill by 96 majority. I am to-day handing out to the press the following reply to Secretary Hyde:

Secretary Hyde knows as much about Federal-aid roads and unemployment as he does about agriculture. For a long time the American farmer has taken his measure, and now laughs at his silly utterances. The charge that the emergency road bill was railroaded through the House is utterly false.

On December 4, 1930, President Herbert Hoover, transmitting a Budget estimate to Congress for an emergency relief appropriation calling for an expenditure of $80,000,000 for roads, said:

"The test of the value of such relief is the ability to pay wages between now and the end of the fiscal year, and I therefore urge that this estimate be given early consideration."

Acting on the President's recommendation, the measure was not permitted to go to the legislative Committee on Roads, but Chairman WILL R. WOOD, of the Appropriations Committee, conducted hearings, lasting only two days, and rushed it through the House under an unanimous-consent agreement with less than two hours' discussion and by unanimous vote.

If there was need for this expenditure in 1930, there is a double necessity for it at this time. We have followed almost verbatim the procedure used at that time, except that our hearings extended for three days and there was nearly six hours' discussion in the House. I repeat that all the evidence shows that this fund when matched by the States will give employment directly and indirectly to 1,000,000 people. Chairman WOOD and other Republican leaders vested with responsibility favored same in 1930 and urged it as an unemployment aid. This year, when divested of responsibility, Mr. WOOD and his associates for partisan reasons opposed the very thing they are all on record as favoring.

Let the Senate pass the measure and, as has been intimated, let the President veto it. We will confront them with their own words.

It is a piece of unmitigated gall for Secretary Hyde to upbraid the Democratic House in passing the first piece of legislation that will give a job to a single human being in America when his own party sat by impotent and suggested nothing. He speaks of the deficit, and I remind him that all of it was created under the present administration, and it remained for the Democratic House to endeavor to balance the Budget when the administration refused to even attempt it.

[Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, in spite of vigorous opposition by Republican leaders, many of his colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle supported this measure last Saturday, which is the only bill passed thus far that guarantees any real relief to unemployment.

Mr. DYER. I am not criticizing. I simply make this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The statement of Mr. Hyde is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE ARTHUR M. HYDE
FEBRUARY 28, 1932

Yesterday the Democratic organization in the House railroaded through a bill for $132,000,000 for roads. The bill was produced on Friday and pushed through, under very stringent rules, on Saturday. A bare 24 hours' notice was given. No consultation was held with the Treasury, which must propose methods of taxation to meet the expenditure. No advice was sought from the Ways and Means Committee as to how they are to meet so large an increase in expenditure and balance the Budget.

The bill was passed in entire disregard of the assurances given some weeks ago to the country by the Democratic leadership in the House that they would oppose all authorization bills, and after they had severely trimmed the Budget recommendations for funds for departmental services. From the regular road appropriations for this department, for instance, they deducted, with great parade of economy, the sum of $10,000,000. They now propose to spend $132,000,000 for the same purposes. At a time when the country is crying for economies of administration and expenditure they pass a bill which requires more expenditures than all of the economies which have painfully and laboriously been achieved by the Appropriations Committee.

The bill purports to be a bill for the relief of agriculture and of unemployment. So far as agriculture is concerned an expenditure of a maximum of $200,000,000 for crop-production loans has already been passed. I should like to call attention also to the fact that, as to the $132,000,000 road bill, the farmer will gain in only part of the fund and will be compelled to pay, directly and indirectly, a considerable portion of the additional taxes which the bill will necessitate.

The Treasury Department and the Ways and Means Committee have been working in complete harmony and with courageous determination to balance the Budget and to preserve unimpaired the credit of the United States Government. This is a matter of vital concern to every person in the country. It is the cornerstone of renewed prosperity. The price to be paid is increased taxation, but not one penny more should be levied in taxes than the needs of the situation imperatively demand. Already increases in corporation, income, and estate taxes have been proposed to the maximum limit. Even these are not adequate. It has been found necessary to resort to a manufacturers' sales tax. Therefore, the increased burden imposed by this bill must be met, if met at all, by further increases in taxes upon commodities and services. The farmer is a large purchaser of such commodities and will have to pay his part of such increased taxes.

An excessive increase in road expenditures from the Federal Treasury this year would undoubtedly endanger the stable development of the Federal-aid program in the future. Excessive emergency support of Federal aid in some years will probably result in insufficient support in other years and thus impair the whole program. That would be disastrous. An assured annual program is much more important to the proper development of our highway system than any possible emergency and artificial stimulus which is of necessity temporary in its nature.

The $132,000,000 provided by this bill will give, directly and in itself, employment to about 35,000 people. This out of 6,000,000 unemployed. True it will create some indirect employment, but the number so benefited will certainly be less than the number directly affected. By extracting $132,000,000 additional funds from agriculture and industry, we shall impose still further strain upon the country and shall deprive more people of employment indirectly than we can employ directly.

The bill has more of the aspects of the pork barrel than of relief from unemployment. Our experience last year is in point. The Federal Government made an appropriation which resulted in an expenditure of $155,000,000 additional Federal funds for road building. The States and local districts reduced the expenditure of their own funds by three-fourths of this amount. In practical operation we expended $155,000,000 more Federal funds, but secured an increase in total funds expended—local, State, and Federal—of only $33,000,000. The net gain in employment from Federal funds was disappointing. The net result was a larger and disproportionate drain upon the Federal Treasury.

The allocation of the fund would be made under the law regulating road funds, rather than upon a per capita basis. The benefits of the fund, therefore, would be unequally distributed. The States having the least population would receive the largest per capita allocation. The States having the greatest population and the largest unemployment problem would receive the smallest per capita allocation. The bill does not go to the problem of unemployment on the basis of need.

But further than all this, if there is to be economy in public expenditures and relief from burdens of taxation upon the people, economy must begin. The President has forcefully said, "We can not squander ourselves into prosperity." The bill ought not to be enacted.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9699, making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9699, with Mr. HOWARD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There remain 80 minutes of debate, according to the unanimous agreement made on Saturday last, 40 minutes on either side.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there are several matters in this bill that I intended to discuss, but a subject has come up which I believe requires a definite reply; and I shall defer taking up the matters in the bill until we get under the 5-minute rule, at which time I expect to offer some amendments.

I had occasion a few days ago to call attention to the disgraceful conditions brought about in the aviation industry by the Century Air Lines in their attempt to so reduce the wages of skilled experienced pilots and the danger to aviation involved through the avarice of this company. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] called attention to the testimony of one E. L. Cord before the Committee on Appropriations. Had that testimony been given by any reputable operator of an air line, had it been given by any citizen who has a proper regard for the safety of the traveling public, and the rights of labor, the testimony would have been very impressive. In fact, after the testimony was given, many Members of the House looked into the terms of existing air mail contracts. No sooner had Mr. Cord left the Committee on Appropriations than he went back to Illinois and started reducing wages, which gives an entirely different aspect to his reliability and the value of his proposition. In other words, he seeks to get Government contracts by lowering the rates and plans to make up the difference out of the pay of pilots.

As far back as last May the Century Air Lines (Inc.) indicated the kind of tactics they were willing to employ against competitors. These tactics will, in turn, indicate the caliber of men operating this company. Just as they came to Washington seeking to get contracts away that are now held by other companies by any means fair or otherwise, just as they are willing to disregard safety by underpaying and overworking pilots, so last May they even went so far as to arrange for the use of violence in competing against reputable companies. Yes; they actually recommended the use of violence and the employment of thugs. I made this charge a few days ago, startling and shocking as it is, by reading a letter written by the traffic manager of the Century Air Lines to their own terminal manager at Detroit. I am going to read it again. The reason I do so, and shall continue to do so, is because this man, E. L. Cord, has the brazen effrontery to deliberately misrepresent facts, to deliberately misinform the public in an attempt to deceive the Congress, in an attempt to deceive the Post Office Department, in an attempt to deceive the public, and in a desperate effort to hide their own contemptible shame, to conceal their own disgraceful conduct, and to pose as persons who have been unjustly criticized. Just let me read this letter again:

CHICAGO, May 16, 1931.

Mr. GEORGE H. PFEUFFER,
Terminal Manager, Detroit, Mich.

DEAR SIR: Any number of people, including executives of the Cord Corporation, have advised me that Thompson is making a practice of telling our passengers, who are on the bus with their passengers on the 1.30 schedule, that they should ask for refund of their ticket and get out on the first ship—which is Thompson's—and that you have no hesitancy in refunding their money to them so that they can do this.

I can not understand why it should be necessary for anyone to tell you not to permit this, but rather arrange to offset it and, if possible, give Thompson a dose of their own medicine, but it seems that some one must tell everybody just what to do.

Why don't you get some good, hard-boiled scrapper and ride him on that bus all day long. If he hears anyone making a suggestion to any passenger about Thompson, have this tough beat him up. It was necessary to do this in the early railroad days and also in the taxicab and bus developments, and apparently it is necessary for us to adopt this sort of tactics.

But, in any event, as manager of Detroit, I should think you would have the interests of the company sufficiently at heart to do something aggressive to offset this condition. Why don't you run your show in such a manner that Thompson would be ahead to induce you to work for them instead of for Century, and make your terminal more profitable and satisfactory than any other terminal that Century has, inasmuch as Detroit is the best source of traffic that we enjoy.

Get after this situation right now, and let me hear from you what has been done about it.

Yours very truly,

CENTURY AIR LINES (INC.),
By W. F. BLISS.

In the face of this, this man E. L. Cord has the audacity to send out a statement to the press. Here it is:

E. L. Cord clarifies pilot controversy in patriotic interview.

He refers to himself as "E. L. Cord, president of Century Air Lines (Inc.)," the same company referred to in the letter I have just read, instructing their manager to employ thugs to beat up people. I suppose that was for patriotic reasons.

In other words, this low type of citizen who advocates the employment of thugs to do violence is now trying to get profits by employing scabs and hiding it all in a patriotic appeal. He says that his labor troubles are the result of "anarchistic activities," and he refers to his pilots as "reds." When he says that, he knows that he is making a deliberate, vicious, and malicious false statement. Gentlemen, over 50 per cent of the pilots referred to as "reds" by this miserable person are ex-service men who served as flyers in our Army during the World War and rendered actual flying service for their country. Forty-five per cent of the pilots in the pilots' organization are now members of and affiliated with the reserve forces of the United States Army or Navy. [Applause.]

Among the pilots now on strike are such boys as Eddie Hamilton, Dean Burford, Duke Skoning, Bledsoe Payne, Kenneth Cool, C. H. Thomas, Wheaton, James Benedict, Paul Meng, and others, all veterans of the war. Because they refused to work under indecent conditions, which would impair the safety of the public, he refers to them as "reds." They did not go on strike. They were locked out after they had agreed to arbitration. They were discharged by this same Cord after he went back on his own word to arbitrate. Mr. Cord has absolutely no regard for the truth. He mailed a copy of this "patriotic interview" to every Member of Congress. He said, among other misstatements:

The impression has been given that the readjustment in pilots' compensation on the Middle Western lines reduces them to only $150 per month. This is not true.

Gentlemen, that statement was made by Mr. Cord himself when a committee of the pilots conferred with him on Sunday, January 31, 1932, in Mr. Cord's own office, in Chicago, Ill. The committee consisted of five, and I will nail his lie right now. This committee consisted of Messrs. Dean Burford, Eddie Hamilton, A. B. Thomas, Duke Skoning, and R. Williams. Two of these gentlemen are in the gallery this minute. Those men represented the pilots. They went there and Mr. Cord told those five men, who are ready to face him any time, anywhere, and who are ready to testify under oath, that he first suggested a reduction of 40 per cent, and that eventually he was going "to take the romance out of aviation" and bring them down to $150 a month; and yet he has the audacity to send out this "patriotic interview," as he calls it. There is not a meaner employer of scab labor in the entire United States than this man, who disregards the truth and calls it a "patriotic interview."

Do you know what he offered the boys? Three dollars an hour for day flying and $5 an hour for night flying. Suppose a boy is on a 2-hour or a 3-hour flight, he would get $9 for that day. He would have to lay over at the terminal until the next day and then come back on the third day, and if that does not make it less than $6 a day I do not know what does. If he is on a three or four hour night flight, according to the regulations of the Department of Commerce, he can not fly back the next day. Imagine attempting to have a pilot fly four hours every night.

The regulations of our Department of Commerce would not permit any such condition, and this man comes before a committee of Congress, criticizes the Post Office Department, criticizes existing contracts, and says he can do the same work for 50 per cent less, and he figures the 50 per cent less by taking it out of wages. He went from Washington with the idea that we were going to enact special legislation for his discredited company. In all likelihood we would have enacted legislation if an exposure had not been made on the eve of consideration of his proposition. He is known now—and his company is known now—they are not the kind of men and company to intrust the development of aviation.

He said before the committee that he had no opportunity to bid. I have here seven contracts that were opened since he has been operating, in which he or his company did not bid. Why? Again, a matter of truthfulness. I think the gentleman from New York, Mr. MEAD, will bear me out in that.

If the Cord Corporation was really interested in aviation in 1927, as they state on page 369, why did they not bid on the following routes:

No. 27, Bay City-Chicago, established July 17, 1928.

No. 28, St. Louis-Omaha, established May 1, 1929.

No. 29, New Orleans-Houston, established January 23, 1929.

No. 30, Chicago-Atlanta, established November 19, 1928.

No. 32, Pasco-Seattle, established September 15, 1929.

No experience was required of the bidders on any of these routes, although it may have been a factor in making the award between two equally low bids. Six months' experience was required of bidders on the following:

No. 33, Atlanta-Los Angeles, established October 15, 1930.

No. 34, New York-Los Angeles, established October 25, 1930.

The Cord Corporation calls attention to these two routes, but has never said that it wished to bid on them at the time they were ready for installation. At the time it had never flown an airplane over a line of its own and did not on its own showing until March 23, 1931.

To give you an idea of how unsafe it is for any passenger to travel on the Century Line planes at this time, the man at St. Louis who is in charge of checking the planes as they come in, that is, as the pilot leaves the plane, checks the oil, the fuel, the controls and the entire plane, is working 17 hours a day, and he had no assistants. That was one of the causes of the protest of the pilots. Since the strike those conditions have been changed in St. Louis, only during the lockout. Of course they expect to go back on the 17-hour basis later.

Pilots insist on having good mechanics. That, too, was a part of the protest of the pilots, that the Century Air Lines were paying assistant mechanics $60 a month and senior mechanics $100 or $110 a month and overworking those men. I do not need to tell my colleagues how skilled, accurate, and how careful must be the work on the motors and the rigging of the planes. As compared with the prevailing rate for similar skilled work, on other operating companies, it was 30 or 40 per cent less. It was at that time that the pilots protested to the company, and since then there has been some temporary change, only during the lockout, in the hope of beclouding the issue.

I submit that we can not, in this early stage of development of aviation, permit anyone to obtain Government contracts who plans to operate his company in this manner. I hope that I express the sense of this House when I say that we shall expect and insist that all operators of airplane companies having contracts with the Government shall operate their planes safely and skillfully and shall treat their pilots and labor decently, in accordance with the compensation we are paying them. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman include in his statement the wages paid by different organizations operating under contracts with the Government, and also to pilots and mechanics?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I shall be very glad to do so, and I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Pilot's hours and pay

Air mail carrier	Hours per month	Pay per month
Pan American, Caribbean division	80	$835
Boeing, Chicago-Cheyenne	81	756
Pan American, Mexican division	75	650
Western Air Express	105	625
Colonial	105	625
National parks	85	550–625
Varney Air Line	85	575
Eastern Air Transport	85	575–600
National Air Transport, Chicago-Dallas	85	575
Cord Corporation [1]	70	210

[1] Pay $3 per hour; $5 per hour for night flying, but does not do any night flying because Department of Commerce will not approve inexperienced pilots for night duty.

The above will indicate immediately the rates paid by reputable operating companies and the rate offered by the Century Air Lines when the present trouble started.

Now this matter of wages, gentlemen, was brought up in the Committee on Appropriations and the figures which I have just quoted are corroborated by the Postmaster General and will be found on pages 288 and 289 of the hearings before the subcommittee having charge of this bill. Let me read just one or two lines which tell the traffic story:

Mr. THATCHER. You say that they pay [salaries paid pilots by Cord Corporation] the pilots less than the others are being paid?

Mr. BROWN. What was the last figure that they offered their pilots?

Mr. GLOVER. From $200 to $250 a month; $250 was the maximum.

Mr. THATCHER. What is the average?

Mr. BROWN. The average paid to the air mail pilot is about $600 a month. It runs from $500 to $700.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think $600 a month is too much.

Mr. BROWN. I do not, gentlemen. I have been around with them quite a bit.

Mr. PARSONS. I think that will be very interesting to the membership.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, please do not get the idea that I am oversentimental in consideration of the pilots. Before we permit a man to take command of a ship at sea, we require that he must have many years' experience, must have served an apprenticeship, must have served as third mate, second mate, and first mate, before he gets a skipper's license. With the present development of steam and the art of shipbuilding, the responsibility is not as great as it was years ago, although the responsibility is great. We must take every precaution in the case of heavier-than-air planes. Flying is still in its infancy. The responsibility of a pilot, with 10 or 12 passengers, is enormous. He must navigate, besides piloting the plane; he must attend to the motors, watch his fuel, oil, temperature of motors, should be well trained, and understand meteorology. To take underpaid, inexperienced men or boys who have just obtained their license, as the Century would like to do, and put them in control of passenger planes, I say is unsafe. It is not only unsafe to the people who travel in the air but it is unsafe to the people below, and we ought to put a stop to it immediately. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am extremely interested in the post-office section of this bill and as a member of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, I have a number of amendments which I shall take up under the 5-minute rule. There are a number of matters, however, that I would like to discuss with you right now.

Following the discussion of my distinguished colleague from New York concerning the air mail situation, let me say that on to-morrow our committee will begin hearings in connection with the forming of a new air mail policy. The Comptroller General has criticized the present policy and a great many Members in the House have evidenced an interest in this important question.

The two matters which I desire to discuss with you affect the application of the rule which has been adopted with every appropriation bill passed up to this time. That rule pertains to promotions and automatic increases in salaries. I want to impress upon you the fact that the situation as it applies to the Post Office Department in the field service is entirely different from the departmental service here in Washington.

The amendments which I will offer in connection with that particular feature of the bill are as follows: First, in order to make more certain the intent of Congress in requiring the department to fill vacancies by appointing substitutes and to prevent, if possible, any excuse for defeating the purpose of the legislation by a technicality I will suggest this amendment in line 25, on page 67:

Or when substitutes are employed regularly to the extent of 44 hours a week.

The second amendment I will offer on page 66 will add another proviso, the language of which is as follows:

This limitation on promotions shall not apply to any postal employee receiving $2,000 or less annually.

The facts in connection with the suspension of automatic promotions are as follows: There are 11,586 employees in the first and second class post offices affected by this amendment. The amount saved by depriving them of their annual increase in salary amounts to approximately $1,000,000. The men affected for the most part are married, with consequent family responsibilities. They are scattered all over the country in every first and second class post office. The average length of service of the men affected by this amendment, whose salaries would be reduced unless we adopt the amendments, are about eight years, most of that time as substitutes, during which their salary was very, very meager.

In a letter from one of the representatives of the postal groups this matter is explained more clearly than I can possibly hope to explain it to you. Therefore, with your indulgence I will read the letter. This letter was addressed to me as chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee and also to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS].

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY-TREASURER,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1932.

HONS. JAMES M. MEAD AND JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: In behalf of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, I am asking that no limitation be placed in the postal appropriation bill on promotions or appointments in the postal field service for the next fiscal year.

May I suggest that you incorporate the following proviso into the bill to continue the automatic salary promotions:

"Provided, That this limitation on promotions shall not apply to any postal employe receiving $2,000 or less annually."

There are valid reasons for this suggestion, which I herewith respectfully call to your attention. The salary progression of post-office clerks and city letter carriers from an entrance grade of $1,700 annually to the top grade at $2,100 is fixed by a law which stipulates that they be promoted successively $100 each year, contingent upon satisfactory service. There are approximately 7,000 clerks and 4,400 city letter carriers in these four automatic salary grades at present. Most of them worked five years or longer as substitutes before appointment to the regular force at $1,700, which means they have been in the service at least eight or nine years. This period is in reality the employees' apprenticeship. For the most part, they are family men with the consequent responsibilities. To deprive them now of earned promotions would be expensive economy—resulting in a very small money saving and a large loss in service morale.

It sounds impressive to say that Congress will stop all promotions as an economy measure. There may be cases where this can be justified. Yet in this instance there would be a breach of contract on the part of the Government and the economy is aimed directly at the lowest-paid groups—those least able to stand it.

The total saving effected by denying these earned promotions is approximately $1,000,000, which is to be withheld from 11,000 wage earners scattered throughout the country, and which ordinarily would be spent in the usual channels of trade. In view of the billions appropriated by Congress to stimulate business, it is rather petty to now suspend this legitimate expenditure in the form of earned wages and increased purchasing power. Congress should not be put in the position of stimulating only big business and throttling little individuals.

President Hoover has called attention to the importance of dissipating fear and restoring public confidence as an aid to economic recovery. The suspension of the earned promotions of men receiving $2,000 or less annually—men who have been in the public service for seven or eight years—is not calculated to establish confidence and security among the postal employees. It is certain to have the reverse effect and to this extent retard the reconstruction program. If every dollar hoarded means a destruction of from $5 to $10 of credit, as the President states, then withholding these promotions is equivalent to governmental hoarding at the expense of a low-wage group and can not be defended morally or economically.

There is another phase of the proposed legislative limitation that is of great importance to 25,000 substitute post-office clerks and city carriers. I refer to the restriction on the filling of vacancies which will likely prevent appointments of substitutes to regular positions throughout the next fiscal year. Any such policy in the field Postal Service would be disastrous and manifestly unfair to the substitutes.

Postal work must be performed daily without delay. It can not await a return of prosperity. If a substitute is required to do the work of a regular clerk or carrier at a lower rate of pay—as would be the case—it means a lowering of wage standards. It is true there would be a money saving by this practice, but it would be another breach of faith and a further hardship upon the substitutes. For the substitute would have the work and responsibility of a regular without the pay or leave privileges and the benefit of other protective laws.

Post-office substitute employees, numbering 23,000 in all, are now undergoing severe trials. Many of them are dependent upon the charitable donations of their associates. If no vacancies are to be filled until July 1, 1933, it means a continuation of this present very bad condition, which is due to a large extent to restrictive administrative policies of the Post Office Department. The substitutes did not benefit as they should from the 44-hour week law enacted at the last session of Congress. Instead of a 4-hour Saturday, as Congress intended, we have regular clerks in Chicago, Newark, and other large offices working six hours on Saturdays and who then are required to take two hours off during the week when the time is of no value to them. This perversion of the law affects the substitutes adversely.

An accurate picture of the general substitute-employment situation was personally brought to your attention in Nashville last November by a delegation of post-office substitutes. Since then, except for the extra Christmas work, these conditions have grown steadily worse.

The present departmental policy is against filling vacancies, and, inasmuch as this is wrong in principle, as we see it, it should not be sanctioned now by Congressional action. If this is done there will be a tightening up of this restrictive administrative policy that will prevent the appointment of substitutes for the next 17 months.

Furthermore, it implies there is little expectation of an early business revival as the result of the costly reconstruction measures passed by Congress, despite public protestations to the contrary. For, if postal vacancies are not to be filled for 17 months, this indicates a distressing lack of confidence on the part of Congress in the efficacy of its remedial measures for economic stimulation.

For the reasons herein stated I sincerely hope that the House Appropriations Committee will not include in the postal appropriation bill any restriction on filling vacancies in the field service, and also modify the provision limiting promotions to exclude those employees receiving $2,000 or less annually.

Very sincerely yours,

THOS. F. FLAHERTY,
Secretary-Treasurer National Federation of Post Office Clerks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want you men to consider this matter very seriously before you vote upon these amendments. I want you to consider the pathetic plight of men who for the last 5, 6, 7, or 8 years have been reporting every day and every night to the large post offices throughout the country. Many of them have been given one hour or one day and in some cases, perhaps several days' work each week. They have reported and reported, day in and day out, year in and year out, and if any of those men were fortunate enough to have secured a regular appointment within the last two or three years this rule aims to penalize them.

The lowest-salaried men in the Postal Service, those who were substitute clerks and carriers until the last two or three years, and the laborers who are now in the service, are the only ones to be punished by the application of this rule.

The bill indicates very clearly that the postmasters, assistant postmasters, supervisors, and others in supervisory positions are to be exempt, but it shall apply with undue severity, to the lowest-paid men in the Postal Service. I sincerely hope the amendments I shall offer at the proper time will be adopted by the committee and the House.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

I do not wish it to be understood that I hold any brief for the Cord Co., concerning which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] spoke a few minutes ago and about which he made quite a bitter speech a few days ago. I will say, however, that Mr. Cord and his associates, who appeared with him before our committee, impressed me very much not only with their reliability but their sincerity. Whether or not they could make the contract under which they proposed to carry the air mail, both foreign and domestic, at practically half the amount we are now paying, I am not able to say, and the committee did not have time to make the investigation which would be necessary in order that it might be informed on that matter, but I do hope and believe that the testimony they gave before our committee will eventuate in a large saving to the Government of the United States on existing contracts for carrying the air mail.

It is only fair, I think, to submit to this Congress a letter that I received from Mr. Cord, dated February 26, which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1932.

Hon. WILL R. WOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WOOD: Referring to the statements made by Mr. LAGUARDIA on the floor of the House some days ago in which he charged me, personally, with beating down of pilots' wages to a point of $125 to $150 a month and which Mr. LAGUARDIA stated was less than that earned by the truck drivers in New York, and to his statement that our airplanes were unsafe and now operated by inefficient and incapable pilots, I beg to advise that our present scale of pay permits the pilot to earn from $300 to $400 per month; that the ability of our pilots is determined by the Department of Commerce and that all of them are duly authorized to fly transport ships by that department and are individually inspected by the inspectors of that department before any passengers are permitted to be carried. Our midwestern lines, the lines to which Mr. LAGUARDIA referred, are now being operated by 17 pilots who have had an experience from 1,100 to 8,800 hours each, as certified by the department license they carry. The department requires only 200 hours' experience.

I attach copies of two articles written and run in the Los Angeles Times as to the situation on the Pacific coast, showing conclusively that malicious attempts have been made to destroy a legitimate business.

For your information, these air lines were started in the early part of 1931, when few new projects were being attempted. These lines have carried more than 25 per cent of all the passengers who have ridden by air in America since their inception. These lines directly employ nearly 400 people and consume vast amounts of raw materials. For instance, the gasoline consumption alone amounts to 10,000 gallons per day.

The articles in the Los Angeles Times show conclusively the confidence that most of our employees have in us.

Very truly yours,

E. L. CORD.

This is from the Los Angeles Times of February 22:

AIR LINE PILOTS HIT UNION RULE—ORDER TO REPUDIATE FAITH IN CORD TO BE IGNORED—BENWAY, CENTURY-PACIFIC VETERAN, CITES AMITY—EFFORT TO FORCE ISSUE INTO CONGRESS REVEALED

Demands were made yesterday from the Chicago headquarters of the Airline Pilots' Association, branch of the American Federation of Labor, that local pilots of Century-Pacific Airlines repudiate the statement they issued here last Saturday expressing satisfaction with wage and working conditions and confidence in E. L. Cord, backer of Century-Pacific.

The demand, according to E. L. Benway, veteran air skipper, and until yesterday acting chairman of the association's executive council in Century-Pacific, will be ignored.

SUGGESTIONS CITED

Benway announced he resigned yesterday from the executive post in the association's Century-Pacific membership.

At the same time he revealed that the Chicago headquarters of the association have made demands on the local flyers which he termed "rank attempts to get us to bite the hand that's feeding us."

"The association during the past few days has attempted to make the Century pilots fight Mr. Cord," Benway explained.

"We were told that as members of the association we must wire our congressional Representatives in Washington and 'knock' Mr. Cord and Century.

DUE TO CHICAGO ROW

"The way it looked to most of us is that the association is trying to 'cut Mr. Cord's throat' so that Century-Pacific will be unable to get any of the air mail contracts the 'big three' are dividing in Washington.

"We don't want to be traitors to a group, but why should we bite the hand that's feeding us, and double-cross our employers because of some association's demand?"

The local fight with union forces, as represented by the association, resulted from 21 Century pilots being discharged from the Chicago line, also controlled by Cord, because they protested a salary cut.

EXPRESS CONFIDENCE

"Perhaps there was a mistake made in cutting the Chicago boys, but that undoubtedly would have been straightened out if the union had not stepped in and gotten 'tough' about the matter," declared Benway.

"And now the association is trying to push us into a battle. We don't want to battle; we are satisfied and our employers are gentlemen trying to do the right thing.

"We issued that statement Saturday expressing our confidence and satisfaction and we intend to stick by it."

Nineteen of the thirty-one Century-Pacific pilots signed the statement. It was learned that all but one flyer on the line belong to the association.

FEW MAY RESIGN

Five or six of those who did not sign may resign from the company, it was indicated yesterday.

The balance of the pilots who did not sign will follow with the majority, according to those in touch with the situation.

The Airline Pilots' Association was formed last spring for the purpose of binding skyline skippers together professionally, but with no indication that it intended to become a labor organization.

A charter of the American Federation of Labor was granted to it quietly last December. Many of the pilot members, prior to the Chicago tiff, during which unionism and its methods of force and picketing first cropped out, revealed they were unaware that the American Federation of Labor had become involved in the Nation's latest mode of transportation.

Then there is another item in the Times of February 23, which reads as follows:

[Los Angeles Times, morning, February 23, 1932]

UNION SUSPENDS AIR-LINE PILOTS—NINETEEN AT LOCAL AIRPORT TELEGRAPHED NOTICE—ACTION INDICATES OUSTER BY FEDERATION OF LABOR—CENTURY-PACIFIC EMPLOYEES STAND BY COMPANY

Suspension of 19 of the 26 pilots of Century-Pacific Airlines from the Airline Pilots' Association, aeronautical arm of the American Federation of Labor, was revealed here yesterday in a telegraphic notice filed from Chicago union air headquarters and signed by the Central Pilots' Executive Council of the association.

The notice resulted from the 19 local pilots going on record here in an expression of confidence in E. L. Cord, backer of the Pacific Coast group and of Century Airlines of the Middle West, and pointing out their satisfaction over Century-Pacific wage and operating conditions.

PILOTS DEFY UNION

Defying the Chicago union forces which, some of the pilots declared, tried to force them to wire derogatory statements to Washington that would reflect on Cord and Century-Pacific in its efforts to obtain air mail contracts, the local pilot group refused to repudiate their official statement supporting their employers and the company.

The local situation was precipitated by the labor union in Chicago involving Cord's Century Airlines. Pilots on the middle-western line were discharged when they objected to a salary reduction.

Stepping into the situation with usual union tactics, the Airline Pilots' Association attempted to cultivate strife in the ranks of the local organization. It was revealed that the supposedly professional association was actually a branch of the national labor-union organization and its purposes and activities were brought to light.

TO BE EXPELLED

With receipt of the suspension notice yesterday—which, it was pointed out in the telegram, means that the pilots will be expelled as soon as the association can get its board of directors together—the local situation was clarified.

"This means that the 19 men who stood by us are out of the association of their own volition, because they realized that to stand by their company probably would mean losing membership in the association," it was said by O. R. Fuller, president of Century-Pacific.

"The remainder of the 26 men will have to quit the union or quit the company is our understanding of the ultimatum sent them by the union.

"Century-Pacific will not interfere with them. It is their own problem.

"We have been fair to all our men and their expression of confidence in us and the company is indicative of their treatment.

"A fight by other interests to monopolize air-mail contracts evidently has resulted in the union forces being used as a tool to drag our pilots here into a situation in which they are not involved."

I thought it was only fair that the other side of this proposition should be stated. I know nothing about the merits or demerits of the fight that precipitated this trouble. I do know, and many of you know, that the racketeers and the plug-uglies in Chicago, as well as in many other cities, require and deem it absolutely essential that this corporation have protection for its property, whether that property be on the ground or in the air, and there is abundant proof that attempts have been made to destroy such property.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me state that I can not yield to anyone for any purpose until after I shall have finished making my remarks. When I am through, if I have some time left and if I feel so inclined, I may then yield for questions.

On last Thursday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] saw fit to make a personal attack on me from the floor of the House. His remarks, as revised and extended by him, are recorded on pages 4863 to 4869, inclusive, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD published for that day (February 25, 1932). He is a veteran of six successive Congresses, and in addition to having challenged me to combat he has also chosen the weapon—"mud pies." I hope to be able to sling them with as good aim and telling results as he has done himself. He claimed to be displeased at what I had said in a speech before this body on February 19. At that time I promised to reply to him one day during this week. I also promised to prove to you that I made no statement here on Friday, February 19, that is not absolutely true.

In the first place I wish to say to this self-appointed regulator of my conduct that little do I care what he thinks or says concerning me or my party. He hails from Massachusetts. I suppose his ancestors landed on Plymouth Rock. It is a great pity that Plymouth Rock did not land on him instead of permitting his ancestors to land on it. I do not believe he made his attack upon me on account of what I said, but I am rather inclined to the opinion that it was because I had the temerity to speak at all.

Another reason why he assailed me is probably due to my forgetfulness. I forgot to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, my self-appointed guardian, if I might have the privilege of addressing the House. But the straw that broke the camel's back, perhaps, was the introduction into the RECORD by me of a short but timely editorial clipped from a newspaper published in my district.

My speech of February 19 and the editorial referred to, which was extended in the RECORD by unanimous consent, consumed a page and a quarter of space in the daily issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This is the only space I have used since Christmas, despite the fact that others have talked almost daily, and despite the further fact that a Member of the other party in another body used 160 pages of space on one occasion at a cost to the Government of approximately $8,000.

I am well acquainted with the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the effect that a new Member of Congress should be seen and not heard, but I know of no rule of the House on which he can base this opinion. His attitude in the matter is dictatorial and undemocratic. He is notorious for his matchless egoism and conceit. His arrogance is inexcusable, and his pernicious activity on the floor of this House invites attention to his intolerance.

I wish to advise the gentleman from Massachusetts—and any others who believe as he does—that so long as I shall hold a commission from the Governor of the sovereign State of Georgia to represent the people of a great congressional district in this House of Representatives that I shall avail myself of the privilege of addressing the House when I feel inclined to do so. Before coming here I had been elected by my people to municipal, county, and State offices. I was sent here to represent the people of the first congressional district of Georgia in the Congress of the United States. My rights and privileges here are equal to those of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I shall continue to forget to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts for permission to address you. I also reserve the right to ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD such documents as I may choose to have so recorded.

In this connection I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts that if some newspaper in the country will publish an editorial concerning him and his service, and will base the editorial on facts, I will gladly ask that it, too, be extended in the RECORD.

The gentleman from Massachusetts refers to me as a new star in the legislative firmament, a new leader in Congress, and he speaks of the beginning of my career in statesmanship. In reply I want it distinctly understood that I make no claims to greatness. I am not a star in any kind of a firmament. I am not a leader. If I were leading this group, we would be traveling in a direction other than the one pointed out by the occupant of the Whie House and his official spokesman.

Before leaving this phase of my subject, however, I want to say that I prefer to be here in the early morning of my career rather than in its late evening, as I understand is the case with the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am told that great rumblings are already being heard in his district which indicate that he is soon to be taken out of the picture, feet foremost, and pointing toward "the rising of the sun."

I was almost moved to tears as I listened to the Republican gentleman from Massachusetts wax eloquent in his defense of my party. What I have had to say about my Democratic colleagues and what I shall say of them in the future is purely a family affair. It is something that should not concern the gentleman from Massachusetts and I do not believe him to be sincere when he claims that it does concern him.

May I pause at this point long enough to ask a question: When did the Democratic Party reach the point in its existence that it would request—or even be willing to permit—a Down-Easter Republican aristocrat from Massachusetts to defend it against any charge? When that time comes I will quit the party.

The gentleman from Massachusetts questioned my statement that other Democrats are thinking as I think and that some of them are beginning to talk as I talk. To prove the truthfulness of that statement, I refer you to that manly "broadside" delivered two days later by no less a person than that peerless Democrat, Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, the Speaker of this House.

With this off my chest, I come to the main issue. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth is simply this: The gentleman from Massachusetts is disturbed about what I had to say with reference to the President's attitude toward the relief of our distressed people, the millions of men, women, and children, American born, who are loyal to a flag that is emblematic of liberty, freedom, and justice and has waved over the land of the free and the home of the brave for more than 150 years, and whose Government should be of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Am I to be blamed because a system of government of the people by commissions and for the privileged classes and foreigners has not met with the approval of the people? Have I distorted the facts in saying "our President proclaimed from the housetops that the Government should not contribute $1 for relief?" If I have, please inform me in which of his utterances he has ever taken a different position. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts make you believe that the American Red Cross is an official agency of the United States and that the Government can claim credit for its activities, and at the same time state to you that a call from this great organization is heeded by the people as a moral obligation upon their voluntary generosity?

In 1921 there was pending a resolution to appropriate $20,000,000 to buy food for people; not Americans, not people who had a right to look to our Government for assistance, but people who were living in Russia. Mr. Hoover, who was then the Secretary of Commerce, said:

Public charity is not to be an avenue through which this problem can be solved.

Again he said:

It does not look to be a very great strain on the population to take $20,000,000 for a purpose of this kind.

But listen to him in December, 1930, nine years later, after he has become the country's Chief Executive, and when American women and children are hungry and in want:

In order that the Government may meet its full obligations toward our countrymen in distress through no fault of their own, I recommend that an appropriation should be made to the Department of Agriculture to be loaned for the purpose of seed and feed for animals. Its application should, as hitherto in such loans, be limited to a gross amount to any one individual and secured upon the crop. The Red Cross can relieve the cases of individual distress by the sympathetic assistance of our people.

The phraseology of the legislation itself limited the use of the money thus loaned for the purpose of buying seed and feed for work animals. No animals were included but horses, mules, oxen, and asses. Not one dime of the money could be legally spent for feed for the milch cow. None of it could be used in the purchase of feed for swine. Not a penny could be used in raising poultry. Nothing was authorized to buy feed for the faithful dog; and if, perchance, the borrower used a portion of the loan for the purpose of buying human food for his overworked wife or his undernourished children, he subjected himself to trial and the payment of a fine of a thousand dollars.

The recommendation of the President for an appropriation to be made to the Department of Agriculture to be loaned for the purpose of buying seed and feed for animals was not a recommendation for relief of the hungry Americans who needed human food, not feed for animals.

I still maintain that I did not misrepresent the attitude of the President in my remarks of February 19, and what I said then I reiterate now, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have had placed to-day on the Clerk's desk a petition asking for the discharge of the Committee on Agriculture from consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 60, authorizing the Federal Farm Board to turn over to the American Red Cross 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to be processed into flour by the Red Cross and distributed throughout the land wherever there is want or hunger or undernourishment.

There is no need for this to be a partisan issue. I want to give an opportunity to every Member of the House, Democrats and Republicans, to sign this petition and turn the Government-owned wheat, or at least a part of it, over to the Red Cross.

The wheat now owned and controlled by the Government costs the taxpayers of America 15 cents a bushel per year for storage or $6,000,000 for this 40,000,000 bushels of wheat referred to in Senate Joint Resolution 60, introduced by Senators CAPPER and WHEELER, or $24,000,000 for storage per year for all the wheat owned by the Government.

Many of us in the House of Representatives—most of us, in fact, Republicans and Democrats alike—will go back to our constitutents this fall and tell them that we have voted billions to relieve corporations, to relieve the railroads and banks and insurance companies, but we will be forced to admit under political pressure that we have done almost nothing to relieve the distress, the hunger, and the undernourishment among the hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of American citizens who are unemployed through no fault of their own. We voted for a moratorium to relieve the economic and financial situation in Germany and other foreign countries. How can we consistently go home to our own constituents, many of whom are suffering from malnutrition and are hungry, and ignore the urgent needs of our own people who ask for bread from the Federal Government and are given a stone?

For the Federal Government in this emergency to donate its own wheat to relieve millions of hungry American men, women, and children is not a dole. That is no unemployment insurance or placing a premium on idleness. It is the duty of all government in great emergencies to feed their own people. It would be monstrous to call that fundamental responsibility a dole. It comes before and beyond the Constitution and is the reason for the Government itself. We must provide in great national crises for the welfare, health, and lives of the American people. The Congress in 1921 appropriated $20,000,000 for foodstuffs to relieve the starving Russian people, and the House passed a bill in 1924 by a 2 to 1 vote to provide foodstuffs for the hungry German women and children. Can we consistently continue to ignore the plight of our own people? I believe, my colleagues, that I am rendering a political service to every Member of this House by giving him or her an opportunity to sign the petition at the desk, asking for the discharge of the Committee on Agriculture, irrespective of partisanship, to show that you realize that there is undernourishment, hunger, and destitution in America and that the Congress of the United States is not deaf, dumb, and blind to the suffering and privation of millions of unemployed American citizens.

Let me say to those Members of the House who may be reluctant to sign any kind of a petition that the rule for discharge of committees is a rule of the House. You may not have voted for the rule, or you may not have liked it, but it is just as much of a rule to-day as any other rule of the House of Representatives. Every other legislative body in the world has some sort of a workable rule to control and discharge committees, and properly so; otherwise there would be no representative government, as the committees become the masters instead of the servants of the House. So there should be no fear on the part of any Member of the House that he or she is doing anything irregular or against the party organization or even contrary to the existing rules of the House.

I rose for the single purpose of announcing, free from partisanship of any kind, that the petition to discharge the Committee on Agriculture of Senate Joint Resolution 60, which passed the Senate two months ago by a unanimous vete, is now on the desk, and those of you who believe that there is hunger in the land and that the American people in this affliction are entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government and wish to cast a vote in this emergency to help relieve the hungry and destitute without expense to the taxpayers—as a matter of fact, saving $6,000,000 to the taxpayers—you have that opportunity by signing the petition at the Clerk's desk.

I want you to sign the petition on its merits, and I can assure you that if you go home this fall and tell your people that you have simply voted to relieve big corporations, railroads, and banks, as we all have done, and have ignored the suffering and undernourishment among our own people and have failed to do anything at all by your voice or vote or signature to relieve human misery in America, we will all be held strictly accountable by our constituents, and properly so. [Applause.]

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to take the time allotted me to discuss the merits or the demerits of the bill now pending. There has been a great deal said by some gentlemen discussing the air mail service in regard to the proposition made by the Cord Co. for air mail contracts, especially with reference to their offer to render the service at a much lower rate than is now being paid.

Some gentlemen seemed to be impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] when discussing this matter. The gentleman said that he did not wish to be considered as criticizing the Postmaster General. Well, I think the effect of his remarks is such, when taken literally, as to cause reflection on the administration of the Postmaster General.

Mr. Manning, spokesman for the Cord Co. before the committee, repeatedly said that the policy of the administration was such that it created a monopoly in favor of certain companies now enjoying contract privileges.

I do not think so, but so far as I am concerned, as compared with the Cord Co., I am in favor of giving monopoly to those who have it, if such it be.

Who is the Cord Co.? I am not here to criticize any member of the Cord Co., except in the capacity in which they placed themselves before the committee considering this legislation. So far as I know, they are all excellent gentlement, but that does not alter the fact so far as their relation goes, to this matter.

The committee inquired into and discussed the financial responsibility of the Cord Co. I did not hear one word or one question from any member of the committee—and I heard all of the remarks made—except as to financial responsibility. They were shown to be worth more than $50,000,000. We have a report in the record, filed by Mr. Lyndoh L. Young, attorney for the Cord Corporation, in Washington, and we let him tell us who they are and what they are.

He says that the Cord Co. was organized by Mr. E. L. Cord and Mr. L. B. Manning, and is a corporation with $56,000,000 assets, $15,000,000 of which is in cash or its equivalent. He also says that they operate in every one of the 48 States. If it stopped at that it might be all right, but he goes on in the last part of the sentence and says, "as well as in 40 foreign countries." Here is a giant corporation with $56,000,000 to back it, $15,000,000 in cash and Government securities, that wants to come in and take contracts from American owned, controlled, and operated companies—small companies with capital of perhaps from one to three million dollars.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. This great concern has been in progress for a number of years, as I understand it, and to-day they want to get this contract. Why was it not possible for them to come in two or three years ago when these other companies were bidding and participate in those bids?

Mr. LARSEN. I think that is a very pertinent question.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is this the company that wants the contract to Cuba?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes; as I understand. Mr. Cord and Mr. Manning organized in the automobile industry in 1924 with a million and a half dollars. They have now increased the assets of the Cord Corporation to approximately $56,000,000. They went into airplane construction and operation in 1927, some two or three years before the contracts of which they now complain were made. Of course, they had the privilege of bidding on the contracts when let, and they were let, at least in several instances, to the lowest bidder. There were two important bids, one for the service between New York City and Los Angeles, Calif., and the other from Atlanta, Ga., to Los Angeles. These two big contracts were let nearly two years ago for a period of four years, and no reason appears why they could not have bid on them. Why did they not bid then if they wanted the contracts? They made no bid and made no complaint until December of last year. They never came before the Postmaster General, according to their own statement, until December, 1931. When they came before the committee they said they were willing to carry this mail for approximately half of what the Post Office Department is now paying. Of course, they ought to be able to do that, after the other company has gone out into the undeveloped field and built up a passenger service and established the line. They certainly should be able and willing to make concession and carry the mail for much less than the other company, which has borne the expense of development.

Suppose the Government says to a homesteader, we will give you a lot of land for $1.25 an acre, and you are to live upon it for three years and make certain improvements, which he necessarily has to make in order to live there. Then suppose that the homesteader has stayed there for two years; do you not think you could find plenty of men who would say to the Government, if you will run this fellow off and give me the land, I will be willing to pay $10 an acre for it? The propositions are analagous. They came here and made complaint before this great committee, and the committee questioned only as to financial responsibility—not as to foreign operation and holdings, not as to foreign entanglement, foreign stockholders, or anything else. The Postmaster General has been criticized before the committee and before this Congress because he is not willing to give this Cord Co. the contracts and take them away from the companies now serving.

Mr. ARNOLD. If the gentleman has any information along that line, I would be glad to have him put it into the RECORD.

Mr. LARSEN. I shall read it to the gentleman. He must have the information himself, because it is contained in a letter addressed to Mr. BYRNS, the chairman of this committee, by an attorney who lives in the city of Washington. I read from page 369 of the hearings authorized to be printed by your committee:

> The Cord Corporation is operating in 1,186 communities, in every State in the Union, as well as 40 foreign countries, with total assets of approximately $56,000,000, of which amount approximately $15,000,000 is in cash and Government securities. Cord Corporation has no bonds, bank loans, or preferred stock. Its net earnings and those of its subsidiaries for the year 1931 will exceed $4,000,000. The Cord Corporation has a labor pay roll of $50,000 per day, and at the present time has 10,000 employees. The company's stock is held by approximately 15,000 stockholders residing in each State in the Union and 13 foreign countries.

The record does not show how many of these employees are in the 40 foreign countries, but there must be a large number.

Here is the corporation that comes in and talks about a monopoly—with all of these foreign holdings. It operates in 40 foreign countries and has stockholders in 13 different foreign countries. They come here and plead like babies—talk about giving a monopoly to these American institutions—they are pleading for a monopoly to be given to a half-American, half-foreign corporation—a hybrid. Evidently the gentleman from Illinois did not read this part of the record.

Mr. ARNOLD. Has the gentleman a list of the stockholders of these concerns now carrying the mail, so as to see whether or not there are any foreign stockholders among them?

Mr. LARSEN. I do not think the record shows any such information, but as the gentleman was a member of the committee considering the matter, before he criticizes the department and condemns the Postmaster General, he ought to have secured that himself, and if the gentleman had put it into the record I would now be able to read it to him.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does not the gentleman know that the stock of all of these concerns is dealt with on the New York Stock Exchange and that, of course, stockholders are scattered throughout this country and abroad as well?

Mr. LARSEN. That is the explanation the gentleman from Illinois would give, but it is not the explanation that the attorney for the Cord Corporation gave, and it is not what the record shows. Never mind the stockholders wherever they may reside. I am talking about the business operations of this concern. The transactions on the exchanges did not put the Cord Co. into business in the 40 foreign countries. We might well interest ourselves in the few American concerns who have contract privileges secured in an orderly way under the Constitution of this Government.

How did the Cord Co. make the $56,000,000 in about six years, with such an insignificant beginning as a million and a half? What do you think of the transactions of a company which makes such progress in the short period from 1924 to 1931? They start out with $1,500,000 and make $56,000,000. No wonder industrial labor has nothing but its daily wage! The Postmaster General said one reason he did not want to employ this concern was because they were not properly equipped. They do not have satisfactory men to man the ships; the pilots are underpaid, or words to that effect. First-class pilots are usually paid from $600 to $700 per month, but the Cord Co. pilots are said to receive less than half this amount. First-class pilots are usually Annapolis, West Point, or Kelly Field men, highly trained. This, in part, explains how they made the $56,000,000. Some of the Members manifest great interest in labor organizations and seem to sympathize with the laboring man. If you are a friend of labor, show it to-morrow when we offer an amendment to this portion of the bill. Let us see just what you think about taking care of labor.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. Are not the pilots of this Cord Corporation now out on strike as a result of the salaries paid them?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes; I understand that is true. One Member said the other day some of them would be striking up in the air.

Now, who is this Mr. Stinson who was killed on one of these Stinson improved planes? The Stinson Airplane Corporation is a part of this Cord Co. Mr. Stinson, the gentleman who was killed, was president of this subsidiary corporation. How did he come to be killed? Because, we are told, he was on a plane that was not properly equipped. It did not have 2-way radios, or Weather Bureau service. They could not ascertain what the weather conditions were in the direction they were traveling. That is one of the most important things in connection with aviation. The Postmaster General does not give any contract unless the company has proper equipment, such as weather reports, 2-way radios, and in most cases automatic pilots and every device that makes for safety for human life.

The ship that fell in California the other day, killing seven passengers, was apparently wrecked simply because it did not have proper equipment. They had no radio and no weather service and underpaid pilots. They were without proper equipment. They should not have undertaken such service, and yet some Members want the Postmaster General to give contracts to companies like that.

There is another important feature to which I wish to call attention, and that is military defense. What is the best second line of defense we can have in the military? Certainly there is none better than up-to-date, well-regulated, commercial aviation. When a man completes military training in any of our governmental military schools at most he never has exceeded a thousand hours' flying experience. Recently I endeavored to help a young man in my district. He had had two years' flying experience in Government service at Panama, but it was disclosed that he had only been in the air approximately 700 hours.

When I went to the authorities of one of these air mail line companies what did I find? They said, "We can not consider him for position of pilot unless he has had 3,000 hours." That is three times as much experience as the Government training afforded him, and at best he could only qualify as copilot. Where did Lindbergh come from? First, perhaps, from Kelly Field, but later, when equipped for oceanic flight, from this identical line of service. Where did he get his training? He got it in the air fields carrying the mails for this country. It is a second line of defense. It is that line of defense which in military emergency means more to this Nation than any other line of defense we could have, unless it be in the Army itself.

One purpose of this speech is to ascertain why the unusual haste of the committee in getting this bill reported out. We went before the committee and told it we understood the Postmaster General when before the Bureau of the Budget asked for $20,000,000 for air mail service, but that the Budget cut it down to $19,000,000. The Postmaster General said the Director of the Budget left the impression with him that when that money gave out he could come back and get more. How? By creating a deficit. But no honorable officer could afford to do that. Why? Because the provisions of the Watres Act are such as to prevent it. No officer administering such laws in our country has a right to create a deficit except to meet an unforeseen emergency. This was not unforeseen, because the Postmaster General knew it would not be sufficient. He had just cut down 10 per cent, and he said a $19,000,000 appropriation would make him cut 5 per cent more and would not afford sufficient funds to carry out the existing program.

As the chairman knew, we went before the Bureau of the Budget, and the Director informed us they were studying the bill; that they had discussed it with the President, and they were going the next day to see if they could get the President to agree to $20,000,000, provided their investigation that day warranted it. What happened? That very afternoon, this great committee realizing that we had appeared before the Bureau of the Budget, realizing that three of its own members had been before the Bureau of the Budget, all at once reported out the bill. The subcommittee would not wait. Then the whole committee reported it out before the matter could be wound up by the Bureau of the Budget.

Now, I am not criticizing anybody, but I am just giving you the facts. You are entitled to know them, and I want you to know what happened. This great committee said, "Well, we can not make it twenty million because the Budget has not approved it." I imagine you were all here Saturday afternoon, and if you were I would like to have you contemplate for a minute what members of that great Appropriations Committee did regarding the $120,000,000 road bill that had not been approved by the Budget. We were voting on roads Saturday afternoon. There are 35 members of that great Committee on Appropriations. They could not vote sufficient air mail appropriation in this bill because the Budget had not approved it, and yet they could only muster 9 men out of 35 who were willing to vote against that $120 000,000 for roads. Oh, it depends on what it is convenient to do. They are not afraid of the Budget. That is not the trouble. Gentlemen, face the facts. We have a great territory in the Southeast and in the Northwest that now stands greatly in need of air-mail development. Airports have been built at great cost to municipalities and individuals. All over the Northwest, all over the Southeast, all over every section of this country further development is needed. Municipalities have invested millions of dollars in it. Now the committee wants to cut down appropriations. It is the only industry in this country that has been built up during and in spite of the depression, and now they want to butcher it. We will offer an amendment to-morrow, and we want all to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I heartily indorse the action of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] when he asks the membership of this House to sign a petition to take from the Agricultural Committee of this House Senate Joint Resolution No. 60, which provides for the giving, when milled, of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation. Forty million bushels of wheat when milled will supply bread for 10,000,000 people for one year. In this country we have 354,000,000 bushels of wheat ready to be sold, 154,000,000 bushels of which are owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation and 200,000,000 bushels of which are owned by private interests. We have in this country 8,000,000 people out of employment. The cost of wheat ownership to the United States Government is $2,000,000 per month.

Since we convened on the first Monday in December we have been occupied with giving relief to sister nations; dealing with the great problems which confronted the Federal farm loan banks on their bond issues; creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and passing legislation that is expected to release secondary frozen assets in our banking system.

We have been dealing with these problems for business. Five or eight years ago the business of this country would not come and plead with the Congress of the United States for relief, but now we find railroads, financial institutions, industry, and some insurance interests and other interests pleading with the Government of the United States for financial assistance.

Each one of the 435 Members of this House represents a large group of people who are in distress. They are in actual need. They are asking themselves what their Representative is doing to give them immediate relief. Here is an opportunity to give those people immediate relief in one way.

I am against the doctrine of paternalism; but we are dealing with something that represents an emergency, just as much as we dealt with problems representing emergencies during the period of the war. Just as necessity knows no law, an emergency knows no principle. No law or principle should keep any government from helping those in distress.

My friends, those of us of the old-fashioned type of democracy—and I so classify myself, coming from New England—can put aside our convictions on paternalism, because it is not paternalism when we care for the hungry.

The world has never seen a situation like this. We live in a land of plenty. We have an oversupply of food, an oversupply of fuel, and an oversupply of clothing; yet there are millions of people in distress, crying for the actual necessities of life. In this country, my friends, we have not overproduction, but we have underconsumption. One of the important things needed in our economic life is to devise a proper system of distribution. The country needs sane, social legislation.

I wonder if we realize, my friends, that from Maine to California, and particularly throughout the industrial regions of this country, the citizenship of this country has behaved well during this distress? [Applause.] A high recommendation of the stability of American citizenship. [Applause.] But let us realize that we are sitting on a keg of dynamite. We can not expect too much from human beings. The petition on the Speaker's desk should be signed by 145 Members, the number required under the rules of the House, and Senate Joint Resolution 60 should be passed without delay. On December 11, 1931, I introduced House Joint Resolution 119, covering the same subject.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HAINES].

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I have not heretofore attempted to address the House, preferring to be a hearer rather than a talker. I also appreciate the fact that as a new Member in this distinguished body I am in a great school of training, and desire to be taught rather than to impress myself upon the Congress. I believe, too, that just as men are obliged to train for any profession by going to preparatory school, college, and university, so must a new man coming into these legislative halls be trained in the fine art of legislating laws. I am not a lawyer, neither a college nor university graduate, and am willing to admit that the parliamentary rules of this body have somewhat confused me, but the more I hear and observe the more I am convinced that this form is the best in legislation.

I am a small business man, not one of the group of larger operators in the field of industry but rather one of that group that is rapidly disappearing, and unless this small group is offered more encouragement and is given more consideration and sympathetic patronage on the part of the masses the foundation structure of our great Nation will be destroyed, for I do believe that our Nation became a great one by reason of the opportunities men have had in the past to establish small business enterprises for themselves. Millions have done this. A few have succeeded and stepped in advance; but the great mass of small merchants and industrialists in every line of endeavor have been able at best to make a livelihood for themselves and those whom God has given to them and who, to me, are the most priceless possessions of all, while a few have been able to lay aside small sums of money to hand to their children and their posterity.

Many of these, which I choose to call the great middle class of our citizenship, have been able to educate their children and by self-denial given their children the advantage of advanced schooling. I doubt not that the great mass of the membership of this Congress come from these homes. The spectacle in this present day, however, differs very much from those of the past in that this great middle class are rapidly being denied the opportunities that our fathers enjoyed through the granting of special privileges and the mergers of all types of business into huge corporations and chain stores, with advantages very often that will not permit this middle class to continue operating their business or factory. I have noted with much satisfaction the keen interest manifested by every Member of this body for the well-being of our citizenship, and I know that every Member of Congress is intensely interested that our citizenship shall enjoy the blessings of prosperity. Whether it is within the province of Congress to enact legislation that will restore that prosperity I am unable to predict; but I know that my colleagues in this branch of Congress want to do what they believe to be best for all our people. I think the greatest mistake we can make at this moment is to play politics at the expense of human misery, for is not it true, my colleagues, that as a body of legislators we must be united in purpose? I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether the present administration is to blame for the economic ills that now confront us, nor do I care about that. What I am interested in right now is that we shall find some way out of our present difficulty. I do not believe that any of our people are starving, but I do know that many of them are subjects of charity and many of them in dire need and distress at this time. What I am concerned about to-day is that these people shall get back into industry, and when I say this I only repeat what others have expressed on this floor during this present session of Congress.

I know that there are college and university graduates in the bread lines of our Nation, men with finest sensibilities, and this must indeed be humiliating to such, and yet through our present economic structure in this Nation, we have forced many men and women out of industry. I have voted with you to pass measures here aimed at a readjustment of these economic evils but with much misgiving each time, believing that we have not gone to the core of the source of our present difficulties.

To me it is most tragic that we have the great army of unemployed. I will confess to you, Mr. Chairman, that I have no cure for our present trouble, but I do believe that we have not taken into consideration the present and still growing tendency toward mass production and installation of labor-saving machinery in our manufacturing plants with regard to the great army of men and women that such machinery replaces. Machines that make the burdens of labor easier for a human being are fine and I do not want to go on record as opposing these, but I do want you to know that when industry installs a machine that will deny an opportunity for faithful employees, many of whom have been helping the employer amass a fortune, to have employment, it is time that we, in our ambition and great interest for our fellow man, awaken to the great danger that threatens us, and to me it is no surprise that we have this great army of unemployed when I go into the manufacturing plants of our Nation and see what labor-saving machinery and mass production has done to our people.

I can not help but say, Mr. Chairman, that when a machine supplants human hands in industry, and by that act takes bread and butter from the mouths of our people, throws them out of employment, makes them walk from plant to plant hunting a "job," if you please, then it is time, Mr. Chairman, that the machine be made to contribute to the support of those who are denied a livelihood by reason of the machine. This may sound socialistic to you, my colleagues, but I assure you it is not; it is simply a fact that every Member of this Congress will learn if he will go into the factories of to-day and see what machinery has done to eliminate human hands from industry. I believe there is a way out of this, but it will require courage on the part of each one of us and to be intensely interested in providing a way out.

It may be a shorter day and a shorter week. If this can not be accomplished it may even mean setting aside of some of this machinery and go back to the days of yesterday until we do have the problem solved. I represent a great manufacturing district in that it has a diversified industry, and know of what I speak.

Men have come to me telling me that because of the installation of machines—very often one machine doing the work of half a dozen human beings—they were no longer needed in industry. I have had some men come to me saying that because they had reached an age in excess of 50 they were no longer being considered in industry.

My colleagues, if this be true, then it is time that you and I become interested. My own experience as a manufacturer is that men at 50 are as valuable as men younger, at any rate more dependable as a rule—and at 50 very often the heads of families that need them, perhaps more so than at any time in their history.

I read a year or two ago that in one city in the installation of the dial-telephone system eleven hundred persons were discharged. These had to get into other channels of industry, and if you carry this throughout the Nation one will get an idea of the vast number of persons displaced in this business alone.

This is true largely in every industry. When the machine is installed it usually means unskilled labor and lower wage scales, unless, of course, the machine requires one to be skilled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope I am not understood as being against improved machinery or labor-saving machinery, for I am not. I know the great strides we have made as a Nation, by reason of the invention and genius of our people, and that making machines has added many thousands to the pay rolls of industry. I realize, too, that much of the unemployment in our country is in the ranks of the unskilled, much of which remains unskilled by reason of no need being developed for them. I really think, Mr. Chairman, that one of the ways for us to solve this employment situation, or rather unemployment, is to stop and right-about face in an investigation to learn more about this great question.

I know what machinery has done to my industry. I am a cigar manufacturer and am qualified to speak about this industry more so than others. In 1910 we had 22,519 registered cigar factories in the United States. In 1922 we had 11,576 and in 1929 only about 6,000.

In this industry I verify my previous statement that the middle-class, smaller business man is being rapidly driven out of industry, for, mark you, Mr. Chairman, many of these cigar factories were not large, but they did offer an opportunity to those who owned them to manufacture and sell their product and have some degree of prosperity. The number of cigars manufactured annually varied very little from 1910 to 1929, in round figures about six and one-half billions. Note, please, while the same quantity of cigars were being manufactured, there was such a large decrease of cigar factories, or more than 16,000. I do not have the figures of the number of men and women less in these 6,000 cigar factories than were employed in the 22,519 factories back in 1910, but I am confident there is a tremendous decrease, and men and women have been thrown out of employment and denied the opportunity to follow a trade they were taught, by reason of machines taking the place of human hands.

It so happens that a man perfected a machine that would make a cigar. The cigar it produces is far from perfect, however, and much inferior to the cigar made by human hands. About 20 per cent of the cigars it does produce are unfit for regular brands and are usually packed under fictitious brands commonly called "seconds." These machines are virtually owned by one concern; at any rate, the American Tobacco Co., which owns the American Cigar Co., also owns the concern manufacturing the cigar machines.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of Congress to go into the history of this machine and what it has done to the cigar industry other than to say that the man whose genius produced this machine is reported to have remarked: "If I had had the least idea of the trouble that machine would cost, it would never have been made." These machines were first being produced in Hanover, Pa., a part of the district I represent. Due to a fire the plant was moved to Brooklyn, N. Y., in March, 1902. The same American Tobacco Co., headed by Mr. James B. Duke, owned cigarette-making machines.

The difference between the latter and the cigar machine is that you can go in the market and buy a cigarette-making machine but you can not buy a cigar-making machine. These are leased, and the terms of that lease at one time were upon a royalty basis of $1 per thousand cigars, with a down payment of $3,500 at installation, with a guaranty that they use the machines 17 years, to buy all their own parts and hire mechanics to keep them in order and in first-class condition, and to pay the royalty upon a minimum basis of 1,000,000 cigars per year. There are probably more than 6,000 of these machines in use right now upon which royalty is being paid.

The economics of the machine, however devastating, are quite simple. Before surveying its wider aspects, let us take a brief look at the affairs of the company which makes the machines. This company is The International Cigar Machinery Co., two-thirds of whose stock is owned by American Machine & Foundry Co., largely owned by the America Tobacco Co., or Duke interests.

With 6,000 machines in use, it can make about $5,000,000 profit, upon the basis of the rental charges, and now probably one-third of the cigars manufactured are being made on machines.

With the entire production of cigars in the country made on machines it would require about 20,000 machines with an enormous profit, and all at the expense of the men and women in industry; for, if you please, there is no need for the skilled mechanic who was paid up to $22 per thousand previous to machines supplanting human beings skilled in this trade, whereas the machine builds this cigar for less than $6 per thousand. Now, what is the result of all this machinery in industry? It has brought down the wage scale in every section where cigarmakers were employed, down to the level of competing with the machine. If I had the time I could give you the entire history and development of the machine and what it has done to the industry; the many, many men and women who have been denied a living wage; the many, many small cigar manufacturers who have been driven from this business; and how that, in doing this, one man, the man who was largely responsible for the machine coming into the cigar industry, amassed a great fortune, and his home on Fifth Avenue remains one of the most perfect, and his young daughter reputed to be the richest young girl in the world. I admire men who can accomplish all this, and do not want to be misunderstood as trying to create a bad feeling toward men who were wise enough to see the possibilities and also to have the courage to undertake that in which they believed; but what I am deeply concerned about is that in other lines of industry the same results have been obtained, and all of this has had a tendency to break down our economic structure for permanency.

I do, however, here indict the American Tobacco Co. for being unfair in their competition and the destructive advertising campaigns they have waged in the newsprint and radio.

Their "spit" campaign was a shame in the eyes of all fair-minded, honest Americans, for this campaign was waged against that group of small manufacturers who never had a prosperous era, but were content to produce quality cigars and sell them to the trade at honest prices. There never was a greater shame cast upon business than that campaign, and for me to discuss this any further is repulsive, as was the advertising to the great group of well-thinking people. One of the greatest evils of our present day is destructive competition, and you will find that the cigar and tobacco jobbers and retailers in this country are the victims of very unfair business ethics, making very little if any profit. We have been deeply interested in the farmer, and do you know, Mr. Chairman, that in Kentucky right now, tobacco is being sold at one-fourth of a cent a pound? My colleague representing a constituency in that State only recently told me that the tobacco was on the hands of these farmers, and they did not know what to do with it and were thinking of using it as a fertilizer.

When I am told that the American Tobacco Co. had profits above $41,000,000, and that they paid a bonus, above the salary, to Mr. George Hill, of more than $2,000,000, and when I know that it costs probably 8 cents a pound to grow tobacco, is it any wonder that I am concerned and here charge bad faith on the part of men using machines largely in the manufacture of their product, for which they have created a national demand?

During all this time these same machine cigar manufacturers, and who produce billions of cigarettes, tell us that they can not stand additional taxation, and if additional taxation is placed upon them, it will reflect in the price they can pay the farmer, and then excite the retailers of this country to the point where they write Members of Congress to oppose additional taxation on cigarettes. Why, Mr. Chairman, two unskilled mechanics and a machine produce 750,000 cigarettes in 10 hours. The cigarettes are packed and every other necessary packing, stamping, and so forth, is done by machinery, so that there is no need for much labor, and during the year 1931 the parent company, the American Tobacco Co., raised the price of cigarettes with no justification whatever, as all raw materials had declined, and if you will take the time to investigate the prices they paid the growers of tobacco you will agree with me that four companies closely interlinked, and who are the only buyers the farmer has for his tobacco, have not kept faith with the farmer any more than they have with men and women in industry.

Mr. Chairman, I have some information taken from trade papers that illustrates clearly some of the evils of the machine supplanting human hands in industry. On February 19, 1931, an extract from Tobacco, a trade publication, I read, headed as follows:

ON COMPLETE MACHINE BASIS

According to a bulletin recently released by the American Cigar Co., that corporation has invested a lot of money in cigar machines. More than $6,158,750 has been used to place the American Cigar Co. on a complete machine basis and current relative production costs have been reduced thereby as the production has been increased. It is the demand of the concentration in general industrial conditions, and that's all there is to it.

No thought or concern for those displaced in industry is even indicated here.

United States Tobacco Journal, February 16, 1931, carries an item from Garfield, N. J., advising that the American Cigar Co.'s plant at 18 Passaic Street, there, which has been operated there for the past 15 years, will shortly be closed. The work at present handled there will be divided between the plants at Camden and Philadelphia. On June 26, 1930, the Milan branch at Milan, Tenn., the last of the cigar factories operated by hand in the South by this company, received official notification to cease manufacture of cigars. The factory had been opened in 1925, and was the major factor in the growth of the town. This followed the closing of other plants in Kentucky and Tennessee, all because machines had been installed in other plants replacing human hands in industry. An item from Fulton, Ky., under date of February 27, 1930, states that "factory closed down last Tuesday and will move to new location where cigars will be made on machines instead of handmade." In December, 1930, a news item from Tampa, Fla., states that American Cigar Co. moves M. Valle plant to Trenton, N. J., with the statement that "folks who have the interest of the city at heart dislike to see this industry leave."

And so on, Mr. Chairman, I could cite instance after instance where in the industry with which I am most familiar, machinery has played havoc, causing much unemployment. In my own town, where a great many cigars are produced, our people employ all native white Americans, who own 90 per cent of the homes of the community; there is no outside capital employed in this town, local cigar and furniture manufacture supplying employment even during this time of depression. But, Mr. Chairman, in the cigar factories of my community no machines are used, and as a result I have no hesitancy in saying we give more for the money to the smoker and keep human hands employed in industry. I should dread to think what would happen in my home town if the cigar manufacturers would install these machines.

They are patriotic gentlemen, interested in the welfare of their employees, and, Mr. Chairman, if we are to restore prosperity we must employ men and women and not have them be subjects of charity, and the same soul loyalty to the wage earner must be given as business expects from you and me here in Congress.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress will have the courage to get to the root of our present unemployment. I know it requires courage to do it and that there are those who will frown upon any movement that will disturb the present efficiency in factory production. I believe that what I have cited in my own industry can be paralleled in every other line of manufacture; and while I do not want to say we should tax machinery, we should at least expect that where machines take work away from human hands without an opportunity for them to be reemployed something should be done whereby the machine will be made to contribute to the support of those it has supplanted. I trust, however, that our industrial leaders will be patriotic in this matter and either work more shifts, shorter days and weeks, so that men now unemployed might get back jobs that will enable them to look every man in the eyes without being humiliated by reason of being obliged to go to the board of charity in the local community for food and clothing.

This every red-blooded American is ashamed to do, but let us thank God for the fine group of our American citizens in this land who have been interested in the welfare of their neighbors and who will continue to show their interest in humanity. We have been tackling these problems from the standpoint of helping large corporations, banks, railways, and so forth, now let us manifest the same interest in the American workingman. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the gentleman from Georgia notified the House that he would reply to some remarks which I had made on the floor of the House. Although I did not hear the whole of his speech, what I did hear showed me that the mountain had labored and brought forth a mouse. There was nothing in his remarks which was worthy of a reply or even worthy of consideration, except one thing. That was so characteristic of the gentleman in his disregard of facts that I want to inform him that instead of being a "Down-East aristocrat" I am a son of the South, and proud of it; that my college cheer is "Rah, rah, night school," and that my trade is that of blacksmith. If he can connect his statements with the facts I would like to have him do so.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Where was the gentleman born?

Mr. UNDERHILL. In Richmond, Va., suh. The gentleman made some remarks the other day, extemporaneously, in which he did better than he did to-day. The remark he made, and to which I refer, was a quotation from an editorial in the Atlanta Constitution, which he said used the language, "To hell with Massachusetts," which he indorsed and in which he concurred.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the people of Georgia subscribe to any such doctrine as that. Massachusetts needs no defense from me, but in all fairness, and in all kindness, too, I do want to show the gentleman what happened in Massachusetts when Georgia was in distress and the Red Cross requested assistance for a stricken people.

In 1927, the year of the great Mississippi flood, at the call of the Red Cross, the citizens of Massachusetts voluntarily subscribed $812,000 for the relief of the stricken area. In 1926, when his State suffered from a destructive hurricane, Massachusetts again voluntarily raised $148,000; and in 1928, when the worst hurricane in recent years came along and Florida and Georgia were laid low, Massachusetts subscribed once more almost $300,000 for relief; and in the drought of 1930, she subscribed $674,000, a total of very nearly $2,000,000. Not one single dollar of this amount was spent within the confines of the State of Massachusetts, but every cent went to the stricken area represented, in part, by the gentleman from Georgia.

When the gentleman says, "To hell with Massachusetts," I wonder if he is old enough to think back to the time of Henry W. Grady, when he was editor of that paper—and it was a great paper in his day—and wonder if the remark he attributes to the Constitution is correct. I have some doubt of it, because he has not said anything which is a fact yet. If they are correct, all I have to say is, "Oh, how are the mighty fallen." In contrast, I quote from the great speech Henry W. Grady, a truly great American, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, made in Boston, Mass., when he said, amid tremendous applause:

Standing hand to hand and clasping hands we should remain united, as we have been for 60 years, citizens of the same country, members of the same Government, united now, and united forever.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has closed the time for general debate.

Mr. LARSEN. I do not think anybody would object to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to enforce the rule even though he does not like it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When the great Speaker, Champ Clark, was Speaker of the House he said anything could be done by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Very true, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland, the House can do anything by unanimous consent, but it does not follow that the Committee of the Whole House can do anything by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

Salaries: Secretary of the Treasury, $15,000; Under Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000; three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $135,180; in all, $160,180: Provided, That in expending appropriations or portions of appropriations contained in this act for the payment of personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, with the exception of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade in any bureau, office, or other appropriations unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act, as amended: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation was fixed, as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act, (3) to require the reduction in salary of any person who is transferred from one position to another position in the same or different grade in the same or a different bureau, office, or other appropriation unit, (4) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the classification act of 1923, as amended, and is specifically authorized by other law, or (5) to reduce the compensation of any person in a grade in which only one position is allocated.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes instead of 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may be privileged to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, the administration is getting ready to give to the small banks, especially in rural sections, another punch below the belt. For 10 years these banks have been mercilessly exploited by the big city banks, with the full knowledge and tacit approval of the administration. The plan was to limit the activities of the country banks, make them absolutely subservient to the big city banks, milk them of their liquid assets, and transfer their cash to the great centers of wealth and population, where it could be utilized and manipulated for stock jobbing and piratical financial ventures.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman's flow of eloquence. The gentleman is always interesting, but I understood we were now reading the bill and all remarks should be confined to the bill. I think the gentleman is going rather far afield, and I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his intention to do so?

Mr. LOZIER. It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the bill and the policy of the Treasury administration with reference to fiscal matters of the Government which are directly involved in the pending Treasury appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will observe the rules and proceed in order.

Mr. LOZIER. The first step was to persuade the country banks to discontinue lending their funds to the people in their respective communities, and banks were especially warned against making loans to farmers on their lands, livestock, and farm commodities, on the specious plea that these last-mentioned securities were not liquid, while claiming loans based on stocks and bonds could be quickly converted into cash.

The scheme worked. Under pressure from the big city banks, and yielding to thinly veiled coercion from the Federal Reserve Board, the country banks reluctantly discontinued making loans to their patrons and filled their portfolios with beautifully printed certificates of watered stock, issued by overcapitalized and highly speculative corporations. The cash, Government bonds, and other easily convertible assets were exchanged for these so-called liquid securities. When the exchange had been consummated and the country banks loaded with these highly speculative securities, the big financial interests "got from under" the stocks and bonds they had wished on the country banks and country investors, and these securities quickly became congealed and their market price fell to unprecedented low levels.

Now, after rural banks had been reduced to impotence by this ancient and none too honorable practice, to make matters worse, the administration sought to increase the allowable credit balances of postal savings banks, so as to draw from the banks a considerable part of their remaining deposits.

But Congress balked and the administration will be forced to abandon its postal savings banks' program. Now when the banks are making a desperate effort to serve their patrons and resume their normal functions, including an extension of credit to farmers, up bobs Uncle Sam and puts on a campaign to sell baby bonds, the inevitable effect of which will be to take from the small banks and country communities a considerable part of what little cash they have left.

Secretary Mills has announced that the issue of these bonds will be "unlimited." That is to say, in marketing these securities, they will not only be offered to the so-called hoarders, but all classes of investors will have an opportunity to purchase. This really means that people who are not now hoarders, but who have misgivings as to the general banking situation, will be attracted by these Government securities, and notwithstanding the low interest rate, will be tempted to withdraw their savings or other deposits and invest the proceeds in baby bonds. Under existing economic and psychological conditions the loss of a little interest will not arrest this movement. By marketing these bonds through banks the Government seeks to bring them immediately and directly to the attention of the customers of the banks who have funds on deposit. And can you imagine the effrontery, audacity, and unmitigated gall of the Hoover-Mills crowd in asking the banks to cut their own throats by encouraging their depositors to withdraw their deposits and buy these bonds?

If the administration had deliberately planned to deplete bank deposits, injure and in many cases destroy country banks, and gobble up what little cash yet remains in rural sections, no more effective scheme could have been devised to accomplish this sinister and cynical purpose than the baby-bond plan. The net result of the Hoover-Mills plan will be to withdraw from rural communities millions of dollars that are now so badly needed to strengthen banks and serve their patrons, and concentrate these funds either in the big city banks or in the United States Treasury. This baby-bond program will absorb bank deposits that otherwise would be available for loans to farmers and other vocational groups.

Every baby bond purchased represents so much money withdrawn from local banks and sent into some distant city, where it can not possibly help the people in the community where the money was earned and where its owner lives.

Under the baby-bond plan the man who is inclined to hoard is given an opporunity, and directly encouraged and invited to withdraw his money from the bank and lend it to the United States Government. In substance the Government says to the people, "You fellows who are suspicious of banks, but lack the intestinal courage to hide your money in socks and mattresses, may now withdraw it from the banks and invest it in baby bonds, which is safer than hoarding and more patriotic." Moreover, not only hoarders but all who have money are encouraged and invited to invest in these governmental securities.

The plan will take $10 out of the banks from moneys on deposit for every dollar it calls out of hiding. Persons who are afraid or ashamed to hoard will be encouraged to invest it in baby bonds. In a few months it will very substantially reduce bank deposits. In this critical period it puts the Government directly in competition with legitimate banking.

This latest Hoover freak formula will enable hoarders to cripple banks under the specious plea that they are performing a patriotic service by furnishing the Government money with which to meet its obligations, when in truth and fact the real purpose is to get their money out of local banks and put it in the till of Uncle Sam, in exchange for Government securities. If this money is left in the local banks it will help create a fund out of which loans can be made to farmers and other bank patrons, thereby enabling banks to resume their normal functions of extending credit as well as receiving deposits.

Reduced to its last analysis this Hoover-Mills baby-bond policy may well be defined as a plan to further deplete the deposits of country banks, and defer indefinitely the making of loans to farmers and their other customers. Seemingly, the administration is indifferent to the welfare of the small banks of the Nation. The scheme to issue baby bonds in denominations of $50, $100, and $500 will reduce the circulating medium and bank deposits in thousands of rural communities. The plan will draw infinitely more money out of the banks than it will draw from places where it is now being hoarded.

There are those who are unduly suspicious and want to hoard but have not done so because they realize the risk, possible loss, or theft of their funds if withdrawn from the banks and buried or concealed in trunks, socks, clocks, and fruit jars. But now the administration comes to the aid of the hoarder and furnishes a dignified excuse for depleting bank deposits and investing the proceeds in Government securities, which, so far as the local community is concerned, has the same effect as hoarding.

The interest on these baby bonds is so low that when the mask is removed the plan is nothing more or less than a refined but absolutely safe system of hoarding. Instead of the money being concealed under the floor or buried in the ground, it is by the baby-bond system withdrawn from local banks and buried in the United States Treasury. In effect, the Government proposes to safely hoard the funds and pay a nominal interest for the privilege.

Please bear in mind that these baby bonds are not issued under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, the Steagall-Glass bank credit liberalization act, or under any recent legislation, but are issued under the war-time second Liberty loan act of September 24, 1917 (40 Stat. 290, as amended; U. S. C., title 31, sec. 753). The securities issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be the obligations of that corporation and not in reality Government bonds, although the credit of the Government is behind them. The baby-bond program of the Hoover administration will neutralize and tremendously reduce the beneficial effects of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Steagall-Glass bank credit liberalization act.

It was never contemplated that the Government, in marketing its securities, would rob the rural communities of their banking capital or assets, or actively compete with legitimate banking institutions by soliciting deposits in postal-savings banks or by absorbing bank deposits through the sale of baby bonds under the pretense that these securities are issued to call hoarded money back to the channels of trade and commerce.

I am wondering what other shortsighted and half-baked policies the Hoover administration is incubating to ravish the American banking system, milk rural communities of the little cash they have left, postpone indefinitely the extension of credit by banks to farmers, and by these and other ill-considered methods intensify the nation-wide distress under which the American people are staggering. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I rise to gain information as to the operation of the proviso so far as it may differ from the general provision at the end of the bill forbidding filling of vacancies in various cases. Wherein does this phraseology differ from the general provision as carried in the present bill?

Mr. BYRNS. As the gentleman from Wisconsin knows, this provision has been carried for many years for the purpose of holding the clerks within the grade to a salary that is the average of the grade. I do not know that there is any particular reason for carrying this language if the section relating to vacancies is to be carried in the bill, except that there may be transfers to different grades, and I can see no reason why this should not be carried, because it will hold their salaries down to the average of the grade.

Mr. STAFFORD. Until about nine years ago, as the gentleman well knows, and especially during the time that I had the special pleasure to serve with the gentleman on the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, we designated the number of clerks to be employed in each bureau and the number of clerks that might be authorized. During my enforced retirement from this body the Congress adopted a new method whereby the Congress votes lump-sum appropriations for the respective bureaus and the promotions are made based upon the classification act. My query is whether there has been any investigation to show whether the appropriation for clerical hire as now administered is greater under this new method of promotion by classification than under the old system, whereby we designated the respective number of individuals in each class.

Mr. BYRNS. The amount for clerical hire is undoubtedly greater. The gentleman realizes that that is due to the action of Congress in making increases. But the gentleman knows that under the old rule, to which the gentleman has referred, where specific provision was made for a certain number of increases, that the promotion was made in the sum of $200 each. Then Congress passed a classification act, which did away with all that practice and changed the whole procedure. Personally I felt at the time that it was not going to do away with favoritism, and I do not think it did in all cases.

As the gentleman knows, we found, after the passage of the classification act, that they began to boost salaries, especially the larger ones, and if something had not been done, it would have soon developed that everybody in the grade would have been drawing the top salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. They would be in classes 1 and 2, instead of many in classes 3 and 4.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. I do not think it ought to be eliminated, even though it may not be entirely necessary, in view of the section the gentleman refers to. There may creep in transfers in various grades where this may be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the old system, can the gentleman give us the average pay for clerks in the departments? Has the gentleman any information as to what the average pay is in the respective departments, as compared with the average pay under the old system, where the clerks were segregated by classes and designated by number?

Mr. BYRNS. The answer to the gentleman would depend largely on what he terms clerical service. The average salary of all Government employees is somewhere around $2,100 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I mean the clerical services in grades 1 and 2 and 3 and 4. I understand the gentleman to say they average $2,100, and I am certain under the old system that the average was below $2,000.

Mr. BYRNS. I think in grade 1, $1,800, and the lowest grade, $1,200.

Mr. STAFFORD. And under the new method the average salary is $2,100, whereas under the old method it was somewhere around $1,600. So no one can deny that the Government has been very generous in providing a higher rate of pay for the respective grades.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman understands that the $2,100 average that I have given him was in all the grades, post-office employees as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give me the average pay in the respective grades?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I can not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, so that I may ask one or two questions of the chairman of the committee, which will serve to give me some very necessary information. I have reference to Post Office appropriations rather than to Treasury appropriations. Perhaps in his reply to my question the gentleman can bring something of value to the new committee on economy.

I notice, first, that the one big thing which the newspapers throughout the country have dwelt upon as necessary to balance the appropriations for the Post Office Department is to abolish the franking privilege for Congress. The total amount that it cost the Post Office Department to carry congressional mail is $530,298. I find that it costs the Post Office Department $34,566,247 above receipts to carry the daily newspapers of the country. Also, that it costs to carry the weekly and monthly publications ten and a half million dollars more than the Government receives for that service, and for all other publications, $26,344,744 additional. Then it costs the Post Office Department to carry the country publications eight and a half million dollars more than it receives, and that the amount which it costs the Post Office Department to carry publications exempt from zone rates is seventeen and a half million dollars more than it receives, or a total of $96,674,617 more to carry publications that are criticizing the Congress for spending $530,298 to answer their constituents when they write to them from Washington or when they send them information which they request. If the newspapers and magazines are going to continue to harp on that subject it might be a good idea for the Committee on Appropriations or Post Office Committee to jack up their rates so that we could balance the Post Office appropriations at least to the extent of some $96,000,000.

We are always talking about taking the Government out of business and keeping it out of business, yet we continue to extend the business of the Post Office Department. The business of the Post Office Department is carrying the mail and the dissemination of information, but I find that on C. O. D. packages we lose $5,321,838, that on insurance we lose over $3,041,944, and that on money orders we lose over $11,294,374, and on special deliveries $166,630. If the Post Office Department is going into or is in private business, why should it not receive enough for service which is outside of its province and legitimate functions to cover the cost? Why should it not receive in insurance premiums enough to cover the cost of insurance? Why should it not receive enough to cover the cost of transportation and delivery of express and freight matter?

I call the attention of the Economy Committee to the fact that that is a pretty good place to start to save a lot of money for the Government. Now, to my question, in the consideration of this bill when these items are reached, is there any possibility of adopting an amendment which will to a certain extent equalize the tremendous burden of expense of carrying the advertising pages of newspapers and other periodicals, cover the cost of insurance, parcel post, or express and freight business, thus cutting down the appropriation through the adoption of rates that will bring in somewhere near the cost of such service?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, of course that is a matter of legislation. The postal rates are fixed by law, and as the Appropriations Committee is an appropriating and not a legislating committee, it has no authority to enter into the matter of rates for any particular character of mail matter. The best thing, it seems to me, for the gentleman to do, if he desires to have an increase in these rates, is to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I am sure that committee will give it attention. The gentleman knows that efforts have heretofore been made to bring about such a change without success.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If any individual Member should advocate a bill to make the newspapers and other publications pay what they really ought to pay, does the gentleman from Tennessee suppose that he would remain in Congress very long?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I have just returned from a trip West. I came to town this morning and have taken real pleasure in signing the petition to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of a resolution for a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people of the country under constitutional methods.

Without any desire or intention to promote an argument for or against beer or wine or any alcoholic beverage, I say to my friends in the House that as I see the situation in the West, many thousands of people who might go along with the average prohibitionist are highly incensed at the attitude which refuses to allow the people an opportunity to express an opinion upon this question.

I think the prohibition cause, if it has any merit in it to-day, is being destroyed by the prohibitionists themselves. What the people of the country want is an opportunity to vote, through State conventions, or otherwise, and they are incensed because Members of Congress will not even grant them that privilege. I hope my friends from Illinois—and I am talking to the Illinois delegation particularly—will sign this petition to give that opportunity to the people of their State. If the general election were to-morrow, we would lose Illinois by 600,000, and FRED BRITTEN and the other Republican candidates would be swept right off the board, through no fault of their own. Illinois is no different from many other States. It is a great Republican State and a great agricultural State. The people of Illinois want an opportunity to vote on this prohibition question, to vote on it under the Constitution as it should be voted on, and you gentlemen who are drys are hurting your cause by the position you are taking.

There is no more burning question before the American public to-day than the now dejected noble experiment on prohibition. A modification of the Volstead law is demanded from every corner of the Nation. It will benefit the farmer, the laborer, and the Federal Treasury alike. It will do more to destroy unlawful sale of alcoholic beverages than all the laws in the land put together. It will put the notorious beer baron out of business. No Member of this House can in fairness and justice refuse to sign the petition favoring a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Distinctive paper for United States securities: For distinctive paper for United States currency, national-bank currency, and Federal reserve bank currency, not exceeding 2,000,000 pounds, including transportation of paper, traveling, mill, and other necessary expenses, and salaries of employees, and allowance, in lieu of expenses, of officer or officers detailed from the Treasury Department, not exceeding $50 per month each when actually on duty; in all, $770,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of such paper at a price per pound in excess of 38 cents: Provided further, That in order to foster competition in the manufacture of distinctive paper for United States securities, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to split the award for such paper for the fiscal year 1933 between the two bidders whose prices per pound are the lowest received after advertisement, but not in excess of the price nxed herein.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: On page 9, line 25, after "$770,000," strike out the remainder of line 25 and all of lines 1 to 8, both inclusive, on page 10.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer, striking out these two provisions, is simply for the purpose of restoring the language of the existing law and the method of awarding contracts for the purchase of distinctive paper for the Government.

These are new provisions inserted in the bill, whether or not carefully worded so as to be in order I will not endeavor to say, but they bring up an interesting subject that was debated here last week and which I shall not refer to at this time. I will simply say that the language, as it will read if my amendment is adopted, is the same as that under which this contract has been awarded over a period of many years. The Government is amply protected in the amount to be paid out by the fact that the committee has seen fit to reduce by $150,000 the aggregate of the appropriation. In the last appropriation bill the amount for this distinctive paper was $920,000. It has been reduced to $770,000. With that reduction, of course, I have no complaint, as I am a thorough believer in the program of economy for the Government.

In the next two paragraphs, where the committee arbitrarily limits the price per pound to be paid for this paper, I must say that we are taking chances of not getting any distinctive paper for the purpose of printing our money. Certainly we all want a little of that available. There is no evidence whatsoever submitted to the committee that it can secure this whole contract for 38 cents per pound. I have looked through the hearings carefully, and while one bidder, a year or two ago, offered to take a portion of this contract at 38½ cents a pound, there is nothing to show that the committee at any point secured evidence that the Treasury Department could obtain the entire 1,200 tons required of distinctive paper at a price of 38 cents. Therefore the department may find itself in the position where, after the bids are opened, no bidder will furnish the paper at 38 cents a pound. Then where will the department be? They will be faced with the clause prohibiting the Government paying more than 38 cents a pound, and still the Government can not get the paper at that price.

The second proviso which I have asked to have stricken out contains this language: "That in order to foster competition in the manufacture of distinctive paper for United States securities." There positively is competition to-day, Mr. Chairman. Anyone who wants to go to the expense of setting up an enormous plant, sufficiently equipped with special machinery and other facilities to be able to supply the Federal Government with 1,200 tons of this distinctive paper, has the privilege of submitting a bid. The Government never has said that only one bidder may bid on this paper. A half dozen bidders have tried it at various times. One year the Comptroller General authorized a small portion of the contract to be let to a separate bidder. All well and good. That can still be done. I personally would be willing to see inserted here language that would actually authorize that sort of thing, but when the language reads "in order to foster competition," which already exists, it implies there is no competition. The fact that only one concern is competent to supply the quantity required does not prove the existence of a monopoly. The market is wide open to competition. There are hundreds of paper makers scattered throughout the country. They are not confined to New England. In New York, Wisconsin, and the West there are many paper mills. They know exactly what is required to produce this distinctive paper. If they see fit to spend several million dollars to equip a plant, they can do so. There is no secret about making this paper. At one time it was controlled by a patent, but that patent has long since expired, and the market is wide open.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. So that if the paper manufacturers of the country desire to compete for this contract, they have that opportunity and have had it right along.

In addition to that, various paper manufacturers have stated that the price at which this contract has been let in years past was not exorbitant, and that in no sense was there any effort to gouge the Government. Nevertheless, some people now impute such an effort to the present contractor. It is purely a business proposition. This country sees fit to encourage big business. We ought to have the best quality of product conceivable, and yet, all at once, in order to satisfy a grudge against a paper concern, certain persons attack that concern. There was an effort to establish a Government mill for the production of distinctive paper here in the District of Columbia, which was fought and defeated, and this is another effort to nurse that same grudge.

All I ask is fair consideration of the method under which this contract has been let for years past. Why is there any occasion to change that policy? By adopting the amendment which I have offered we simply continue the present system of letting this contract.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years, as the Members of the House know, the Government has been wholly at the mercy of a monopoly when it comes to providing distinctive paper. The Crane Co. for years and years, located in the district represented by my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], has had a monopoly in the supplying of this paper. There have been no other companies manufacturing this particular kind of paper, which is peculiar in its texture, of course, and different from that which is provided in ordinary commercial use, which have been in a position to take care of their regular trade and at the same time to supply the full amount needed by the Government. In a case of that kind the committee felt it was necessary, in order to protect the Government, that some limitation should be thrown around the amount which the Government was required to pay. Under the law the Government must go through a more or less foolish process in this particular instance of asking for bids and making advertisements.

In the end there is only one bid, and, of course, there is nothing to do but to accept that bid.

A year ago the Government, in its effort to see if something could not be done to get a little cheaper paper, called for bids based upon the total amount, which was 1,420 tons, if I remember correctly, with the proviso that bids would be accepted for 400 tons or less. There were just two bidders, the Crane Co. and the Collins Manufacturing Co., also of Massachusetts. The Collins Manufacturing Co. submitted a bid for 400 tons at 38½ cents per pound. The Crane Co. submitted a conditional bid. It said:

If we get all of the contract, we will furnish this paper for 43 cents a pound, but if we do not get it all the rate will be 48 cents per pound; in other words, we will bid for the remainder of the paper at 48 cents per pound.

The bids were received and submitted to the Comptroller General, and he very properly, I think, decided that the Crane Co.'s bid should be accepted, because it meant a saving of money to the United States to accept all of it at 43 cents a pound rather than to accept 400 tons at 38½ cents a pound and 1,020 tons at 48 cents a pound. So the Government is paying to-day 43 cents a pound for distinctive paper.

The estimates were based upon 42 cents a pound, it being thought by the department that on account of falling prices there would be a reduction in the cost of paper, but your committee felt that was not a sufficient decrease. Here was a company, mind you, that offered a bid of 38½ cents per pound for 400 tons, and your committee felt that in view of the attitude of the Treasury Department to the effect that the cost of paper should be at least 1 cent less in 1933 than it was in 1932 it was entirely justified in fixing not exceeding 38 cents a pound as a reasonable price for the sale of this paper.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell us where, in his knowledge, a fixed price has been set rather than an aggregate sum in the appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. I have no knowledge of any fixed price, but I will say this to the gentleman: If we made this appropriation without fixing the price, there would be no limitation on the company and it could bid any amount it pleased, and being the only company its bid would have to be accepted.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have not figured it out, but may I ask the gentleman what figure was used in reaching the estimate of $770,000?

Mr. BYRNS. Thirty-eight cents a pound.

Mr. TREADWAY. So you are fixing the amount at 38 cents a pound in your appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. If we were to limit this to $770,000 and not fix an upset price of 38 cents a pound, the gentleman can well see that this sole bidder could come in and bid 40 cents a pound. That company would get the contract and it would have the right to furnish paper to the extent of this $770,000, at 40 cents a pound. We have fixed it at not exceeding 38 cents a pound, and $770,000 will take care of the whole situation if the bid is made upon that basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask whether there was any comparable case where the Government fixed the price of articles which it purchased. I know the gentleman from Tennessee will recall that the price was fixed in the case of the purchase of typewriters. The price of the typewriters was more or less controlled by a trust, and the committee fixed a flat price at which typewriters should be purchased, which resulted in a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Treasury of the United States. This is an instance that is comparable to that, because this one company virtually has the Government by the neck.

Mr. BYRNS. And I am reminded, I will say to my friend—and I thank him for calling my attention to the case of the typewriters—that the price of smokeless powder was fixed several years ago by Congress because it was a monopoly. Because of that action the price was brought down from 65 cents to something a little over 50 cents.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that action was taken at the instance of the then chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. Sherley, who was interested in that subject.

Mr. BYRNS. I believe so.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact, as the gentleman from Wisconsin has intimated, that there was more or less collusion in the case of the manufacturer and the sale of typewriters? The debate on the floor showed that there was an agreement and collusion among the typewriter concerns to stick the Government, but here you have a wide-open market and there is no question of any agreemnt being reached between the paper manufacturers.

Mr. BYRNS. I would not want to charge there was collusion, yet there was some indication of it; but I will say to the gentleman that is no worse than having one man who has the Government at his mercy and can charge any price he pleases. So I think this is peculiarly a case where the Government, in protection of itself, ought to fix the price.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it is a case where the Government can more easily be held up.

Mr. BYRNS. I think so.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collecting the revenue from customs: For collecting the revenue from customs, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, and not to exceed $10,000 for the securing of evidence of violations of the customs laws, including expenses of transportation and transfer of customs receipts from points where there are no Government depositories, not to exceed $79,200 for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, sec. 118a), not to exceed $1,700 for any one person, not to exceed $5,000 for the hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and not to exceed $500 for subscriptions to newspapers, $22,700,000, of which such amount as may be necessary shall be available for the cost of seizure, storage, and disposition of any merchandise, vehicle and team, automobile, boat, air or water craft, or any other conveyance seized under the provisons of the customs laws, when the proceeds of sale are insufficient therefor or where there is no sale, and $494,470 shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia exclusive of 10 persons from the field force authorized to be detailed under section 525 of the tariff act of 1930: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance or repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for use in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, line 2, strike out the word "and," and on the same page, in line 3, after the word "newspapers," insert the following: "and including the purchase, exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor cycles."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I may state to the committee that the Bureau of Customs has had three automobiles at its disposal here in the District of Columbia. This bill takes these three automobiles from the bureau. They need the motor cycles for their messengers, and all the amendment is intended to accomplish is to give them a couple of motor cycles instead of the automobiles we have taken from them. I will then offer another amendment which will restore one of these automobiles for the use of the customhouse in the District of Columbia, which is really a field position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The one here in the District of Columbia is local?

Mr. BYRNS. It is local, but the machine is used at the District office over in Georgetown.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How about the whole of Puget Sound, where there are many cities, all with a head office at Seattle, for instance, called the district of Puget Sound?

Mr. BYRNS. This does not affect Puget Sound.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It does in principle, because it is local.

Mr. BYRNS. This is not local in that sense, I may say to the gentleman. This is for the customhouse over in Georgetown. It is necessary for him to come over here to the bureau every day, and it is also necessary for the examiners here in the District to go around and make various examinations. Having taken three automobiles from him, we felt it was perfectly fair to leave him one for official use only.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is a gain of 1—taking 2 and giving 1.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS: On page 11, in line 15, after the word "Columbia," insert the following: "except one for use in connection with the work of the customhouse in Georgetown."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment to which I referred a moment ago.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The offices of comptrollers of customs, surveyors of customs, and appraisers of merchandise (except the appraiser of merchandise at the port of New York), 29 in all, with annual salaries aggregating $153,800, are hereby abolished. The duties imposed by law and regulation upon comptrollers, surveyors, and appraisers of customs, their assistants and deputies (except the appraiser, his assistants and deputies at the port of New York), are hereby transferred to, imposed upon, and continued in positions, now established in the Customs Service by or pursuant to law, as the Secretary of the Treasury by appropriate regulation shall specify; and he is further authorized to designate the titles by which such positions shall be officially known hereafter. The Secretary of the Treasury, in performing the duties imposed upon him by this paragraph, shall administer the same in such a manner that the transfer of duties provided hereby will not result in the establishment of any new positions in the Customs Service.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the section, beginning in line 16, page 11, and running through line 8, on page 12, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the lady desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mrs. KAHN. No; I think it is self-evident. I do not think it needs any argument.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the committee acknowledges that the provision to which the point of order has been made, abolishing these offices of appraisers, comptrollers, and surveyors of customs, is legislation on an appropriation bill and changes existing law.

Under the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, known as the Holman rule, legislation is in order upon an appropriation bill if it conforms to that rule.

The pertinent portion of clause 2 of that rule is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill * * *.

The committee contends that the paragraph in this bill to which objection has been raised is in order under the provisions of the Holman rule.

Under previous decisions legislation to be in order under this rule must be germane to the bill and must retrench expenditures in one of the three methods set forth in the rule, namely, (1) by reduction of the number and salary of officers of the United States, (2) by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or (3) by the reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill.

Under previous decisions of the House it has also been held that it is not enough merely to reduce the number and compensation of officers of the United States or the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury, but the legislation must retrench expenditures in doing that. On this point Chairman Saunders, in a decision on December 9, 1922, said:

The many rulings on this question are fairly uniform. They all hold that when, on the face of the bill, the proposed new legislation retrenches expenditures in one of three ways the point of order should be overruled, and the rule is generally laid down that the construction should be liberal in favor of retrenchment of governmental expenditures.

Under previous decisions it has also been held that the retrenchment in expenditures must not be conjectural or speculative but must show on the face of the legislation. In this connection Speaker Kerr held:

In considering the question whether an amendment operates to retrench expenditures, the Chair can only look to what is properly of record before him—that is, the pending bill, the specific section under consideration, the law of the land, so far as it is applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practice of the House; and beyond these he is not permitted to go in deciding the question.

In discussing the question of the saving, Chairman Saunders also said:

The Chair can only act upon the proposition which is presented on the face of that proposition.

In presenting this paragraph under the Holman rule the committee believes that it answers all of the requirements laid down under sound decisions:

(1) It is germane; (2) it reduces the number and salary of officers of the United States; (3) it retrenches expenditures; (4) the retrenchment is not speculative or argumentative but is specific; (5) every part of the legislation is essential.

1. Germaneness: The bill makes appropriations for the Customs Service, and customarily carries salaries for the offices proposed to be abolished.

2. Reduction of offices and salaries: The paragraph provides for the abolition of 29 offices established by law and now in existence, with salaries aggregating annually $153,800. Under the provisions of the paragraph these offices are eliminated commencing with the date of approval of this bill. The incumbents in them will at that time be removed from the pay roll.

3. Retrenchment of expenditures: The paragraph retrenches expenditures by the elimination of these offices and the saving of the salaries. That is complete on the face of the legislation.

4. The retrenchment is not speculative: The definiteness of the saving can not be controverted. The bill abolishes the 29 positions. They will be gone. The duties are transferred specifically to other positions in the service. The work will be continued. No added expense will come from this transfer, because the paragraph provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make the transfer and carry out the legislation without adding any new positions. The retrenchment is specific, definite, and complete. There is no escape from saving $153,800, and in making up this bill the committee has taken out that amount.

5. Every part of the legislation proposed is necessary to the reduction: The legislation is divided into the following parts:

(a) Abolition of the positions; (b) transfer of the duties to positions now in the service; (c) change in title of existing positions after the transfer to make the title accord to the new duties transferred to them; (d) require the Secretary to administer the transfer of duties in such a way as not to establish any new position.

The necessity of all portions of the legislation and its intimate relationship to the effectiveness and conclusiveness of the retrenchment must be apparent. Without all of the parts the legislation would not be effective.

The CHAIRMAN. I am afraid the Chair is not in harmony with the position of the lady from California. It would seem to the Chair that this paragraph is safely enfolded in the embrace of the Holman Rule. For the benefit of the lady from California the Chair will say that to be in order under the Holman rule three things must concur—first, it must be germane; second, it must retrench expenditures; and, third, the language embodied in the paragraph must be confined solely to the purpose of retrenching expenditures.

The Chair finds upon examination of the paragraph that it is germane to the portion of the bill wherein it is inserted. The paragraph on its face definitely reduces the number of officers of the United States by 29 and thereby saves $153,800, thus retrenching expenditures.

The remaining question for the Chair to determine is whether there is any language in the paragraph that is legislation which does not contribute to the retrenchment of the $153,800.

The Chair has examined the paragraph with considerable care in order to determine whether the legislation is coupled up with and essential to the reduction of money. The Chair finds that the paragraph abolishes a number of positions, that it transfers the duties heretofore performed by the officers holding those positions to positions now in the service, that in order to accomplish that it confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury authority to designate the titles of the employees now in the service who are to perform the additional duties, that it requires the Secretary to administer the transfer of duties in such a way as not to establish any new positions. It is apparent to the Chair that all the legislation to be found in the paragraph is necessary to accomplish the purpose of retrenching expenditures. The Chair thinks that the paragraph clearly comes within the provisions of the Holman rule and overrules the point of order.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: On page 11, line 17, after the word "appraiser," add the letter "s," and in line 18, after the words "New York," add the words "and the port of St. Louis, Mo.," and in line 23, after the words "New York," add "and the port of St. Louis, Mo."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the Appropriations Committee, in this bill, by this provision, if agreed to by the committee and the House, is undoing something that has been in existence in this country for many, many years. The appraisers of merchandise have been very essential and very beneficial.

I wish to refer a moment to a quotation from a statement by Captain Eble, Commissioner of Customs, made at Portland, Oreg., in July of last year, in which he said:

The most important work incidental to collecting the customs revenue is performed at the appraiser's stores.

Mr. Chairman, the appraiser's office is revenue-producing; and when we take into consideration the vast amount of revenue to the Government through the workings of this office, the incidental expense of the appraiser is negligible.

They are attempting by this bill to do away with the salary of the appraiser at St. Louis, amounting to $4,600. This is the only item that would be saved, as to St. Louis, if you agreed to the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Let me give you some figures in regard to the collections of this office to see whether or not its elimination is justified.

The duties collected in St. Louis in 1927 were $2,917,000; in 1928, $2,870,000; in 1929, $3,230,000; in 1930, $3,039,300.

During 1931 there was collected at this port $2,094,319, and this was in a year when business was very poor all over the country. The appraiser's office was created more than 100 years ago, and it was evidently well thought out and very carefully considered.

The appraiser's office may be said to be similar to that of assessor which appraises property upon which taxes are collected by the collector, and for the same reason that the appraiser and collector should not be the same person, but one should be a check against the other.

If the office of the appraiser were consolidated with that of the collector, one can readily see there would be no such check; and it seems to us that such an arrangement would operate to the detriment of the Government, and we would find an opportunity open, perhaps, to colossal graft.

There seems to be no doubt but that the appraiser's office was meant as a safeguard, and surely it would be unwise and false economy to abolish this or any other department which safeguards the Public Treasury. And let us constantly keep in mind the fact that the office of the appraiser of merchandise is one of the revenue-producing units of our Government, and because of this fact it is my opinion that it should not be disturbed.

I have here a statement from Hon. Edmond Koeln, the collector of internal revenue for the city of St. Louis, in which he calls attention to the fact that some years ago the city of St. Louis, in adopting a new charter, provided that the appraiser and collector for water rates be the same person. Prior to that time they had been different persons. He says that it was but a few months after this took place that it was found in checking back the water department that there were discrepancies amounting to $140,000 a year or more. It seems that they got in a rut and it was practically all up to one man and one organization to handle both jobs, and they found after checking back the records, after they were taken over by the water commissioner and collector of revenue, that many water taps and meters in the city appeared on the records as being shut off for nonpayment and other reasons, which, in fact, were still on and water being supplied to the premises without any charge by the department. This was corrected only after the water commissioner simply assessed all water rates due and then turned over the bills for collection to the collector of revenue.

If we do not adopt this amendment, there will be no check on the work of the appraiser and the collector of customs at St. Louis. The bill provides that the employees, which are few in number, in the appraiser's office shall be transferred to the collector's office. The total expense of the appraiser's office in St. Louis does not amount to exceed $30,140, and they average two and a half million dollars collections annually for the Federal Government.

My amendment would not change the situation, except it would except the appraiser of St. Louis, who receives a salary of $4,600. That is all this would cost the Federal Government if it were agreed to. Is not that true, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; but may I interrupt the gentleman? The gentleman is speaking only of St. Louis. They have collected $1,594,320 customs. But let me call the gentleman's attention to offices where they have collected four or five million dollars, which have no appraiser and no surveyor.

Mr. DYER. Yes; those are places where they do not need an appraiser of merchandise.

Mr. BYRNS. But they collect four or five times as much money.

Mr. DYER. But I think on this one proposition the committee has gone too far. Of course, I take it that it is done under the guise of economy; but it surely is not economy, Mr. Chairman, to take this step and the danger in transferring these two positions in the Government into one, where there have been two officers for more than a hundred years, and it is bad legislation to place all this important work in the hands of one man.

The danger of mistakes, the danger of falsification, are very apparent to those who consider the situation as it would be under the proposed change. With a check provided between the two offices, at a very small expense, there is no danger of loss of money to the Government. I think it is mighty poor economy and that we ought not to permit it. It is going to the extent almost of the Appropriations Committee legislating people out of office. The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. KAHN] made the point of order, which unfortunately could not be sustained by the chairman because it comes under the Holman rule. It is going mighty far, however, when the Committee on Appropriations brings in legislation here putting people out of office and reducing the salaries of those who are in office. That is pretty close to legislating, and I think we ought not to permit it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the action of the committee in abolishing the office of appraiser in St. Louis, but I do not propose to approach the question in the manner in which, at least in part, my colleague did. We have in the St. Louis appraiser's office probably a dozen or more men. I think the chief examiner has been in the St. Louis office for over 30 years. I can not bring myself to believe, even if this office is abolished, that there is any danger of anyone robbing the Government, and I do not feel the present appraiser would think so; in fact I am sure she would not. Men of the highest type are employed in this office, and they will be a check upon the collector if you abolish this office.

The question involved here is whether or not this office should be abolished. The lady in charge of the office in St. Louis is a personal friend of mine. She has proved to be an excellent appraiser. She is always on the job. Naturally, I dislike to see her lose her position.

We collected in St. Louis last year $1,549,320. I think if gentlemen on the other side had not passed the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, we would have collected a great deal more.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. Does the gentleman agree that the committee has shown no favors in this matter—that they have just arbitrarily eliminated these offices all over the country, with one exception.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I fully agree, and I brought that out when the chairman was making his statement on Saturday.

Mr. MEAD. The appraiser in my city is also abolished. Does the gentleman believe there are enough of us representing these cities to form a bloc to obstruct the progress of this wave of economy which so righteously comes upon us?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not. I can see it coming now, and the committee will stand by the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, as it has in every instance this year; all amendments offered are defeated. We will be smothered with noes in a few minutes when the question is put. Mr. Chairman, we are facing a situation that requires us to do a great many things now that we would not do if conditions were otherwise. I am sorry to see anyone lose their position, especially a personal friend, but how are you going to spend money when there is no money to be spent? The Internal Revenue Commissioner is receiving daily reports from collectors all over the United States. They are taking the income-tax returns for 1931 and comparing them with the income-tax returns for 1930, and they are able to see what is going to happen. We have a deficit to face, and it is getting larger all the time. I must admit that the Committee on Appropriations has not treated my city unfairly, as it has done the same to all cities in the country having such an office, with the exception of New York, and with good grace, I am compelled to take the medicine. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor to be a member, proposes to lessen the burden of taxation by abolishing a number of high-salaried offices that are as useless in the public service as the fifth wheel is to a wagon or the appendix is to the human anatomy.

Among these are 29 presidential offices in the Customs Service, 15 appraisers of customs, 7 comptrollers of customs, and 7 surveyors of customs.

The least salaried of all of these officials draws $3,200 a year from the Public Treasury and the highest salaried $9,000 a year.

It was brought out in our subcommittee that by wiping these 29 useless officials off of the pay rolls we are able to make a sheer saving of $153,800 a year, and that is the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I would rather not at this moment.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is making the statement that these offices are useless. I would like him to tell the committee where he got the information that the appraiser at St. Louis is useless.

Mr. LUDLOW. The information came from official sources.

Mr. DYER. What official? Name him.

Mr. LUDLOW. The total receipts of the Portland (Me.) customs office are now about $160,000 a year, according to the Bureau of Customs. Therefore, practically the equivalent of the entire income of that port is required to pay the very comfortable salaries of these 29 useless officials. That money ought to go into the Treasury of the United States instead of into the pockets of officials who do not earn it.

The offices in the Customs Service it is proposed to abolish and the salaries attached thereto are as follows:

Appraisers of customs: Philadelphia, Pa., $5,600; Boston, Mass., $6,000; San Francisco, Calif., $5,600; New Orleans, La., $5,200; Baltimore, Md., $5,000; Chicago, Ill., $6,000; Buffalo, N. Y., $4,600; Detroit, Mich., $4,600; Tampa, Fla., $3,800; Cleveland, Ohio, $4,600; Cincinnati, Ohio, $3,800; St. Louis, Mo., $4,600; Portland, Me., $3,800; Pittsburgh, Pa., $4,600; Portland, Oreg., $4,400; total, $72,200.

Comptrollers of customs: New York, N. Y., $9,000; Philadelphia, Pa., $5,800; Boston, Mass., $5,600; San Francisco, Calif., $5,600; New Orleans, La., $5,600; Baltimore, Md., $5,600; Chicago, Ill., $5,600; total, $42,800.

Surveyors of customs: New York, N. Y., $9,000; Philadelphia, Pa., $5,600; Boston, Mass., $5,800; San Francisco, Calif., $5,600; New Orleans, La., $4,600; Baltimore, Md., $5,000; total, $38,800.

It is no reflection on the very respectable and esteemed persons who occupy these offices to say that they do nothing to earn their salaries. That is not their fault. There is nothing for them to do. The work is so organized that they are absolute excess. If all 29 of them were to go to Europe and watch the whirling wheels at Monte Carlo, bask under the sunny skies of Italy, or cruise up and down the Mediterranean, the work would go on smoothly, methodically, and efficiently without a split second's difference.

Take, for instance, the appraisers of customs, who compose the most numerous class slated for abolishment. There are 15 of these superfluous officials, whose salaries are an annual charge of $72,200 on the taxpayers. There are 300 ports of entry. At 285 of these there is an acting appraiser, who is the real head and director of the appraisal force. At 15 ports where there is an appraiser there is a chief assistant appraiser, who directs the force. If this legislation passes and the appraisers are abolished the chief assistant appraiser will be called hereafter the acting appraiser and the work will go on exactly as it always has gone on. Enactment of this legislation will leave only one appraiser of customs in the service—the appraiser at New York City. Approximately 60 per cent of the entire customs revenue is collected at the port of New York, where the appraisal force consists of about 1,000 employees. The appropriations committee was advised by the Customs Bureau that in that instance it would be advisable to continue the appraiser on account of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the New York office.

There are seven comptrollers of customs, all as useless as a last year's bird's nest. The function of the comptroller's office is really that of an auditor. There are 48 customs districts, which are divided for auditing purposes into 7 groups under 7 comptrollers.

Auditing customs accounts is a highly specialized business, and the active man at the head is the deputy comptroller, who has been brought up in the auditing business and knows it from A to Z. He guides the work and is the authority on all points of administration, while the comptroller draws the big salary. On account of the technical and specialized nature of the work it is easy to realize how big a misfit in the comptroller's job is a politician who is picked up off of the street and appointed comptroller without any knowledge of the technicalities of auditing. It is a joke; a rather costly one, but a joke. Under the reorganization that will follow this legislation the name of the deputy comptrollers probably will be changed to auditors of customs and the work will go on just as usual, while the taxpayers will be relieved to the extent of $42,800 by the abolishment of the comptrollerships.

We now come to the surveyors of customs. There is another indefensible charge on the Treasury to the extent of $38,800 per annum in salaries paid to seven surveyors who are just as useful to the public service as the man in the moon. At every port where there is a surveyor there is an assistant surveyor who performs all of the duties of the head of the office. He is a civil service appointee who is trained in the work. If this legislation passes and surveyors of customs go to join the dinosaur and other creatures of a forgotten age the title of deputy surveyors will be changed to deputy collectors and the work will proceed as usual.

The utter ridiculousness of maintaining these useless and expensive offices in the Customs Service is well known to everybody in that service. Detroit is a great port of entry and there is no surveyor of customs at Detroit although the volume of business there is fifteen or twenty times as great as other places where there is a surveyor. At Portland, Me., where, as I have said, customs receipts are running about $160,000 per annum, there are three presidential officials, all drawing sizable salaries, collector, appraiser, and comptroller. Again I say it is a joke—a costly joke.

Why is it necessary to have three presidential appointees at a small port like Portland, Me., where such a limited amount of customs revenue is collected, while at Galveston, Tex., where we collect close to $6,000,000 a year, there is no surveyor and no appraiser and only one presidential appointee, the official in charge?

The same question applies to Los Angeles, where $5,000,000 is collected annually in customs revenue and where there is but one presidential appointee, the collector.

I might state that there is but one customs official in charge at Winston-Salem, N. C., Savannah, Ga., Seattle, Wash., Norfolk, Va., Nogales, Ariz., Reidsville, N. C., Providence, R. I., Honolulu, Hawaii, Rochester, N. Y., and Houston, Tex., where customs collections run from one to five million dollars at each port. Now, it seems to me if no surveyor or appraiser is necessary at these latter ports, where customs collections run from ten to thirty times as much as those collected at Portland, Me., that the offices of surveyor and appraiser at Portland are absolutely unnecessary and involve a waste of public money. The same applies to these superflous officials who, I see from the record, are stationed at Pittsburgh, Pa., Buffalo, N. Y., Tampa, Fla., Detroit, Mich., St. Louis, Mo., Cleveland, Ohio, Cincinnati, Ohio, and Portland, Oreg.

The abolishment of these useless offices would tend to administrative efficiency, for the presence at any port of two or more officials, all of the presidential grade and jealous of their dignity, is bound to create friction. Therefore, while the appraisers, comptrollers, and surveyors are useless, they are a little worse than useless, for they create inharmony in the service.

If anyone were to propose, with the general distress that now prevails and in the temper of these times, to create these sinecures, he would get nowhere, and would bring upon himself a rebuke from the entire country. Let us do a real service to the country by abolishing these sinecures.

Neither is there any reason in sound administration why the assay offices at Carson City, Nev., Salt Lake City, Utah, Boise, Idaho, and Helena, Mont., should not be abolished, and there is every reason why they should be abolished.

Four distinct savings would be effected, as follows:

First. In salaries to personnel.

Second. In releasing for other Federal activities Government buildings that are now occupied by assay offices.

Third. In the cost of maintaining metallurgical laboratories and purchase of such supplies as crucibles, acids, fluxes, and fuels required to operate these assay offices separately.

Fourth. In savings on express charges on gold bullion.

The entire saving would considerably exceed $25,000 a year on personnel and supplies alone, to say nothing of the saving to be effected by releasing Federal buildings to other Government activities that now occupy leased quarters.

The Government owns the assay buildings at Carson City, Boise, and Helena. The Salt Lake City assay office occupies two rooms in a Government-owned building.

The chief function of the assay offices is to make assays of gold bullion sent in for purchase by the Government.

After the bullion is assayed it becomes the Government's property and is forwarded by express at Government cost to the mint at San Francisco or Denver.

By abolishing the assay offices the Government would save the express charges it now has to pay on bullion from the assay office to the mint. Under the new order the bullion would be assayed at the mint and would be shipped to the mint at the seller's cost.

Assaying ore for prospectors is a very minor part of the duties of the assay offices and no great hardship or hindrance would be imposed on prospectors if the assay offices were abolished, in which event they would send their samples by parcel post to Seattle to be assayed. In modern times the use of the assay offices for this purpose has been confined to small prospectors who usually send in a handful or two of ore to be assayed, and the Bureau of the Mint advises that not over 5 per cent of these samples show any producing value.

The assay offices are ancient institutions which once were helpful in developing mining of precious metals in the West but which long since outlived their usefulness. The Carson City assay office was established March 3, 1863; the Boise assay office February 19, 1869; the Helena assay office May 12, 1874, and the Salt Lake City assay office May 30, 1908. All are obsolete relics of the past, and in carrying out the economy program they should be abolished.

For further enlightenment I will read the following letter from R. J. Grant, Director of the Mint:

FEBRUARY 25, 1932.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your letter of February 20, I am giving below a statement covering the number of bullion and ore assays made by the assay offices at Carson City, Salt Lake City, Boise, and Helena during the fiscal year 1931:

Institution	On bullion deposited for purchase by the Government	On samples of bullion and ore sent in
Carson City	1,111	162
Salt Lake City	400	240
Boise	1,177	667
Helena	976	41

If the facilities of the four assay offices named above were not at the disposal of the public, assays of ores and bullion could be made at the mint in New Orleans or at the assay office in Seattle. Deposits of gold forwarded for purchase could be shipped to San Francisco or to Denver.

Very truly yours,

R. J. GRANT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposed amendment. There are 29 of these offices that we propose to abolish in this bill, the aggregate pay of which is $153,000 a year. The committee was convinced beyond any question of doubt that there is about as much use for these offices, that we propose to abolish, as there is a cat having nine tails. They are purely political sinecures and have been for a hundred years. They were created in the first place as political sinecures, and they have maintained their individuality in that respect ever since. One of these some years ago was appointed at Chicago. At that time he was called the naval port officer. That did not seem to jibe very well with the rest of the offices, so they changed the name to comptroller, and he is still occupying that position and drawing his pay as such. It was suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] that the appraisal of these foreign, imported goods, is a very important function. That is true. Everything depends on a fair appraisal, but these appraisers do not do the appraising. That is done by the collector and under his supervision.

The same with reference to the comptroller. He does not control anything but his salary. All he does is draw his pay.

Then it was suggested there should be a check upon some of these other officers. The check is furnished by the auditors. No one is proposing to do away with the auditing of these accounts, and, in consequence, there is no danger in that respect.

So, as I have stated, it is the same character of office that the subtreasurers were. We tried a long time before we succeeded in doing away with the subtreasurers, and after the adoption of the Federal reserve act there was absolutely no occasion for those officers. They then became purely sinecures, but they have gone, and nobody now contends for a moment that disposing of them has hurt the Treasury Department in any degree whatever. I remember very well when in every State in the Union, especially throughout the North, there were pension commissioners. I dare say there are few of you here to-day who remember what their duties were. They were pure political sinecures. It took years and years for this Congress to do away with them. These offices are in the same category. There is no one who has any excuse whatever for supporting this amendment except those who have these offices in their respective communities.

Mr. DYER. I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If we felt for a moment that it would be a detriment in the least degree to the operations of the Government, none of us would be in favor of their abolishment.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman is so sure that nobody can object to this except those who have these offices in their districts, I would like to ask the gentleman why, for a hundred years, most of which time the gentleman himself has been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, he has not brought this in before?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, it is somewhat like cutting off the pup's tail. We have to do it a little at a time so that it will not hurt so much. We have been trying for a long time to abolish some of these assay offices. We are going to try to do that again in this bill. We have succeeded in doing it time and time again in this House, but the gentlemen over at the other end of the Capitol, for some reason or other, think the whole fabric would fall to pieces if they did not retain them, and we will have that same trouble again. But when we are trying to economize, the best place to economize is where there is absolutely no excuse for the original expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Collecting the internal revenue: For expenses of assessing and collecting the internal revenue taxes, including the employment of a Commissioner of Internal Revenue at $10,000 per annum, a general counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue at $10,000 per annum, an assistant to the commissioner, a special deputy commissioner, three deputy commissioners, one stamp agent (to be reimbursed by the stamp manufacturers), and the necessary officers, collectors, deputy collectors, attorneys, experts, agents, accountants, inspectors, clerks, janitors, and messengers in the District of Columbia, the several collection districts, and the several divisions of internal-revenue agents, to be appointed as provided by law, telegraph and telephone service, rental of quarters outside the District of Columbia, postage, freight, express, necessary expenses incurred in making investigations in connection with the enrollment or disbarment of practitioners before the Treasury Department in internal-revenue matters, expenses of seizure and sale, and other necessary miscellaneous expenses, including stenographic reporting services, and the purchase of such supplies, equipment, furniture, mechanical devices, law books and books of reference, and such other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia, the several collection districts, and the several divisions of internal-revenue agents, $33,650,000, of which amount not to exceed $9,122,560 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be used in defraying the expenses of any officer designated above, subpœnaed by the United States court to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts": Provided further, That not more than $100,000 of the total amount appropriated herein may be expended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for detecting and bringing to trial persons guilty of violating the internal revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

My purpose is to ascertain from the chairman of the committee whether the appropriation for the enforcement of the internal revenue acts has become static or whether there will be opportunity for the appropriation to be curtailed as the years go by. Some years ago they were back several years in the examination of the income-tax returns. Can the gentleman give any information as to the current condition of their work and whether this appropriation of $33,650,000 is likely to be the permanent appropriation, as long as we have the income-tax and corporation-tax provisions in the law?

Mr. BYRNS. No. Not necessarily. They are very nearly current in their work. The gentleman will note that the committee cut the appropriation in the sum of only $110,000. The committee did not seek to make any greater cut in the appropriation for the reason that it recognized that a new tax bill or a new revenue bill would be passed soon, and, of course, that will entail additional duties upon this particular office. For that reason the committee made no greater cut than it did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Were it not for the prospect of additional work being thrown upon the bureau by reason of the proposed income-tax measure, the gentleman's committee would have felt warranted in cutting this appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. I think it possibly could have been cut to a considerable extent, but we did not cut it, for the reason stated.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of civilian employees in the field, including clerks to district commanders, $105,220.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if this reduction of $105,220 contains any reduction in wages?

Mr. BYRNS. No; none at all. There are the same number and at the same salary.

Mr. GOSS. Is there any reduction of wages anywhere through this bill?

Mr. BYRNS. No; except the provision that will be carried at the end of the bill. That does not reduce any wages, but it prevents increases in salaries.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Coast Guard, exclusive of commandant's office, $28,510,220.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask the chairman of the committee with reference to the Coast Guard School. I have had many requests from boys in my district who can not get into Annapolis or West Point, who are very anxious to know about the Coast Guard School. I know they have literature, but I would be glad if the gentleman from Tennessee would take a little time and give us, for the benefit of the RECORD, in order that the public may read it, something about what the Coast Guard is accomplishing in the school.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman that there has recently been established this school to which the gentleman refers, at New London, Conn. It is fashioned along the same lines as the West Point Military Academy and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Its curriculum is about the same.

The appointments are made through competitive examinations. Applications are made to the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and he holds these competitive examinations. When this new academy is completed, which will be in the fall, it will have a capacity of about 200 students.

Mr. GLOVER. As I understand, the students graduate with the same degree as those who graduate at the other institutions?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. The graduates are given commissions in the Coast Guard Service, and in war time they are covered into the Naval Service.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is any preference given to the States?

Mr. BYRNS. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no allocation to the States?

Mr. BYRNS. No.

Mr. KELLER. Why not?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know, but it just is not the law.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

White House police: Captain, $3,600; lieutenant, $3,050; three sergeants at $2,750 each; and for 43 privates at rates of pay provided by law; in all $116,299.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. In debate the other day I called the attention of our colleague from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] to the fact that the White House police, 48 in number, were on the Government pay roll, paid for by the United States Government. The gentleman from Indiana contended that they were a part of the Metropolitan police force, and paid for by the District of Columbia, under the District bill. I want to call the gentleman's attention—because he is present on the floor—to the fact that he was in error. These 48 policemen are paid for by the Government of the United States. They are provided for in this Government appropriation bill, and in the paragraph which I have moved to strike out—and which pro forma motion I will withdraw, because the White House must have police—it is specified as follows:

White House police: Captain, $3,600; lieutenant, $3,050; three sergeants at $2,750 each; and 43 privates at rates of pay provided by law.

The basic salary is $2,100 per year, with an increase of $100 for each year's service and after three years' service they get $2,400 a year, with all of their other privileges. And the next paragraph appropriates $3,500 additional for their uniforms for one year.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman know when it was they were transferred and their salaries paid out of this appropriation?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; a change was made. They were originally taken from the park police. But the park police are United States policemen and are controlled by an Army officer who is designated as the superintendent of park police. And they are all under the supervision of another Army officer, Col. U. S. Grant, 3d. It was from this park police that White House police were originally transferred to the White House and they have always been charged to the Government of the United States.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken and I will tell him wherein he is mistaken. The gentleman is correct in saying they were transferred from the park police, but the gentleman will find that the park police are paid out of District appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. With the Federal contribution of $9,500,000 made for this fiscal year out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And at the time the White House policemen were taken from the park police force they were paid out of that same fund.

Mr. BLANTON. How long is it since they have been paid wholly out of the United States Treasury? All of this $116,299 for their pay one year and the $3,500 for their uniforms contained in this bill comes out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, it was done at the request of Mrs. Harding. They were transferred from the park police force to a separate force for service at the White House. It was at Mrs. Harding's special request that this change was made.

Mr. BLANTON. Then under President Harding they have been paid for by the Government; under President Coolidge they have been paid for by the Government; and under President Hoover they have been paid for by the Government. Then for 10 years of Republican rule these 48 policemen, who were transferred, as the gentleman says, at the request of Mrs. Harding, from the District pay roll to the Government pay roll, have been rendering service at the White House and have been paid for out of the Treasury of the United States?

If they were necessary, I would not hesitate at all to appropriate the money; but I do not believe 48 policemen are necessary to guard the White House in peace time.

Mr. BYRNS. Was there a reduction in the number of metropolitan policemen when these men were transferred to the White House force?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly not. We have nearly 1,300 Metropolitan policemen right now, paid for partly by the United States Government, because we do contribute a great sum toward the expenses of the District. In addition to that, we have the park police force under Colonel Grant and that force is partly paid for by the people of the Government. And we have these additional special 48 White House policemen, in peace times, which for the last 10 years, ever since the Harding administration, have been paid for wholly by the Government of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Regardless of whether there are too many or not enough White House policemen, is it not a fact that the office of President of the United States is a Federal office, so that the police should be paid for by the Federal Government and not by the District?

Mr. BLANTON. I have made no contention that they should not be paid for by the Government. My contention is that 48 special White House policemen in peace time are entirely too many and are not needed, when we remember that we have nearly thirteen hundred Metropolitan policemen and about 100 additional park police, all partly paid for by the Government. It shows extravagance on the part of the last three Republican administrations in this regard.

In the President's Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, he shows on page A17 thereof that he spent $2,547 for expenses at his "Executive Mansion, Mount Weather, Va." When he taeks an outing at his summer camp he ought to pay the expenses out of his $75,000 salary and his other allowances and not make the people pay for his outing. We have to pay the expenses for our outings.

I premised my statement with the remark that he did need policemen, and I am willing to appropriate for every one he needs, but he does not need 48 in peace time. Are we not mimicking royalty when we put 48 special policemen on guard at the White House in peace time? It is too many.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield? The 48 are certainly not on duty all the time. You have to guard your White House 24 hours a day, and it seems to me this is the least we can do.

Mr. BLANTON. I would expect that from a loyal Republican.

Mrs. KAHN. A loyal Republican; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Three 8-hour shifts of 5 policemen each, totaling 15, ought to be sufficient in peace time. But President Hoover has 3 shifts of 18 each, or 48 policemen to guard the White House. The people are asking us to retrench. I wonder if our friend, the distinguished gentlewoman from California, heard the speech over the radio of Mr. Merle Thorpe, the editor of Nation's Business, the other night?

Mrs. KAHN. No; I did not. He does not happen to be a Member of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. He said Congress must reduce, it must retrench, it must cut down, because the people of the United States are not going to stand for anything else any longer.

Mr. TILSON, Mrs. KAHN, and Mr. COLE of Iowa rose.

Mr. TILSON. Did the gentleman vote for the $132,000,000 appropriation Saturday?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to first answer my friend, the gentleman from Connecticut, who, I believe, was the best Republican leader we ever had on the floor.

Yes; I voted for that bill, and I will tell the gentleman why.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Was that retrenchment?

Mr. BLANTON. Please do not interrupt me until I answer the gentleman from Connecticut.

It is the only bill we have passed in this Congress that guarantees any real relief to the unemployed—the only one. The $250,000,000 moratorium bill does not help any. I voted against that. The $2,000,000,000 so-called reconstruction finance act that puts money into the coffers of busted railroads is not going to help the people. I voted against that. The $125,000,000 given to Federal land banks will not help a farmer. I voted against other measures here that will not help the people, but which place added burdens on them, but I did vote for the people's measure—one that will give some relief, and I saw distinguished Republicans on that side of the aisle get up here and try to defeat that bill, which is the only one that promises any real honest to God relief to the people out of jobs back home.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did not the gentleman vote in favor of reducing the appropriation for roads in the agricultural appropriation bill $10,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. That was an entirely different proposition, and I want to say that I followed first my leader, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and then my second officer, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. WOOD.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman did well.

Mr. BLANTON. They made some unanswerable arguments, showing that the money, if appropriated, could not be spent, but you did not have an argument here last Saturday against the bill to relieve public unemployment. You voted against that bill. I helped to pass it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The difference would be only one of degree. If we need $132,500,000 now, that $10,000,000 would have helped some.

Mr. BLANTON. We then had appropriated all the States could use, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Have they not more than they can use now?

Mr. BLANTON. No. When the Government advances this $120,000,000 to the States they will have the money to use. I was in favor of that bill because it is the only real relief that the people out of jobs back home are going to get out of this Congress, and I dare the gentleman's President to veto it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The gentleman from Texas has seen fit to attack the number of policemen that guard the White House and he seeks to charge it up to Republican extravagance because, as he claims, this is the number that not only at present but for the past 10 years has been provided for guarding the White House.

I believe the gentleman from Texas was here when the same number of privates was appropriated for guarding the White House, but they were then park police.

As I stated in the discussion, it was at the instance of Mrs. Harding that the policemen guarding the White House were placed in a separate force. This act went through the House and provided, as I remember it, for 2 or maybe 1 additional private, and, as I recall, 3 additional officers, 2 sergeants and perhaps 1 lieutenant.

For the last quarter of a century there has been this number of privates guarding the White House. These privates are on an 8-hour scale and, certainly, the gentleman from Texas does not wish to compel them to work on a longer basis. He is a believer in the 8-hour scale for policemen as well as for other employees.

This only allows 14 privates to be distributed around the grounds. I know the gentleman on rare occasions has visited White House functions and has seen these policemen on guard, two or three at a gate, and if the gentleman will just picture the environs of the White House grounds he will realize that 14 policemen distributed about the spacious grounds and at the various gates at all times of the day, and particularly in the evening, are none too many to properly guard the official mansion of the President.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Always, to my friend, when I have the time.

Mr. BLANTON. This one item of White House police is costing the people $116,299, and their uniforms for one year an additional $3,500, and I want to call my friend's attention to the fact that for the year 1921, when President Wilson was in the White House, the total expenses for the White House, as pointed out by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], were $293,680 per annum, whereas for the present year, under President Hoover, they were $652,179.

Mr. STAFFORD. And never in the history of the Government has the Executive been doing so much executive work as is now being done by the present Executive. The gentleman may criticize the expenditure that has mounted from the time of President Wilson, nevertheless the gentleman knows that the present organization of the White House is the most efficient in the administration of the duties of the Executive that has ever been carried on in the history of the Government.

True, President Hoover has increased the number of his secretaries. At first there was but one. President Roosevelt's secretary was Mr. Loeb, a very capable man. He was with a dynamic President. We have now a dynamic President. [Laughter.] Oh, the Democrats may laugh and deride, but nevertheless if gentlemen were acquainted with the tremendous burden President Hoover has labored under and the manner in which he performs his onerous duties, they would know that he is a superhuman man. He has a full man's job on his hands. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made an unanswerable argument in regard to the police, but since he got on the subject of the President's three secretaries, when Coolidge and Harding and Wilson and all of his predecessors had but one, I think the gentleman is on thin ice.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet the gentleman from Tennessee, when he had the opportunity, did not raise his voice in opposition to the increase of the number of secretaries.

Mr. BYRNS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did fight it at the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I think for once the gentleman was in error, for it has been proven that the two additional secretaries were necessary in the work of the President's office. But I am glad that the chairman of the committee approves of my position in regard to the police.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we are getting far afield on a small matter. In order that you may know about the White House police, it was in July, 1930, that they were transferred from the park police of the District to the Secret Service of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin was mistaken about it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; that is when they were transferred. It has been demonstrated in tragedy three times that the protection to the President of the United States has not been sufficient. We have lost three Presidents at the hands of assassins because of the want of that protection.

Mr. Wilson realized the danger in which he was living while President of the United States, and was not content to rely on the police, but he had a great many soldiers in and about the White House, and was fearful that that would not be sufficient, so he had iron bars put up at the windows of the White House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? That was during war time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Of course, it was war time.

Mr. BLANTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the President's Budget, the President's creature, recommended to this Congress an appropriation for even an additional number of police. We were asked by the President and his Budget to give $121,200 for White House police, and the gentleman, who is always alive to the people's interest, would not do that, but he voted for only $116,299. In other words, the gentleman himself has voted to cut down in this bill the President's Budget nearly $5,000 for White House police because the gentleman did not think it necessary.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, it occurs to me that we are wasting more time than the matter is worth.

Mr. BLANTON. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that we are paying this money out of the Federal Treasury, $116,299 for 48 White House police, and for an additional $3,500 for their uniforms for one year.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and it all comes out of the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the taxpayers are paying it, but they are getting tired of it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of sites or of additional land, commencement, continuation, or completion, of construction in connection with any or all projects authorized under the provisions of sections 3 and 5 of the public buildings act, approved May 25, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 40, secs. 343–345), and the acts amendatory thereof approved February 24, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 40, sec. 345), and March 31, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. IV, title 40, secs. 341–349), within the respective limits of cost fixed for such projects, $108,000,000, of which not to exceed $15,000,000 may be expended for buildings in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this or any other appropriation for the construction of public buildings shall be used for remodeling and reconstructing the Department of State Building under the authorization therefor contained in the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 907): Provided further, That the building authorized for Seguin, Tex., by the act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1602), shall be constructed on the site owned by the Government on that date: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for work on the building for the Coast Guard or some other Government activity (Apex Building), authorized by act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1605).

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert as a part of my remarks a portion of a speech I delivered in Chicago in June, before the progressive Republican conference.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is that the same speech that the gentleman delivered in my home city during the Christmas holidays?

Mr. PATMAN. It is an entirely different speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not going to object to that speech being inserted in the RECORD, if the gentleman desired.

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will listen to what I have to say now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it upon the same general subject?

Mr. PATMAN. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, we have under consideration the appropriation for the Supervising Architect's Office. In the recent past we have had as Secretary of the Treasury a gentleman who has had a monopoly on aluminum. The Supervising Architect's Office is under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Supervising Architect can be either hired or discharged by the Secretary of the Treasury. Of course he is subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury at all times. I do not believe that any Secretary of the Treasury should use his office for the purpose of furthering his own private business, and certainly not at the expense of the United States Government or the people of the United States. I have before me at this time a publication called the Federal Architect. This is volume 2, No. 1, issue of July, 1931, which indicates that the publication was not commenced until the big public-building program was inaugurated in the United States. Then, for some reason or other, there seemed to be a necessity for this particular publication. It is published by the Association of Federal Architects, 410 Treasury Building, Washington, D. C. Remember 410 Treasury Building is a public building and at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. It has as its editor Mr. Edward B. Morris, of the Treasury Department. If you will look at your Congressional Directory and look up Mr. Morris, or call the personnel clerk at the Treasury Department, you will discover that he is the chief architect.

This particular issue has on page 3, for instance, a picture of the United States post office at Kansas City, Mo. It shows a detail study of colonnade with high-lighted cast aluminum for the ornamental fillings between columns. Then there is an article on the subject of aluminum in modern architecture, showing how aluminum can be used in public buildings. On page 8, in the issue of July, 1931, there is another public building, and on page 9 we find the article, Aluminum in Modern Architecture. That article is written by Mr. McGill, of the Aluminum Co. of America, and shows how aluminum will be used for the ornamental fillings between columns of a certain building of which it shows a picture. On page 10 there is a continuation of that article and how aluminum can be used in public buildings. On page 11 there is a picture of the United States post office at Boston, Mass., showing how aluminum is used for all windows, spandrels, and doorways and stating that the exterior facing is granite, and so forth.

Of course, I do not say that this publication was primarily for the purpose of telling the architects that they should use aluminum. I do not say that it was a mandate to the private architects of America that they should specify aluminum in drawing their plans and specifications for public buildings, but I do say that it doubtless resulted in just exactly what I have suggested may have happened. On page 21 there is another article about aluminum. This edition is devoted largely, though not wholly, to showing the private architects in America how they can use aluminum in the construction of public buildings. Remember that the Supervising Architect is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, under the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury, of course, has gone out and employed many private architects in this building program in order that the work could be expedited. Along with the hiring of these additional architects this publication showed up and was sent to the architects of America in order that they may know that they could use aluminum for different purposes in the construction of public buildings in America.

I do not think the office should be used for any such purpose as that. Of course, this is only one of the small things, but should be mentioned in connection with this bill. In Pittsburgh, Pa., there is a Federal reserve bank building, and if you will notice the specifications for that building you will find that it has more aluminum in it, I suspect, than any other one building that has been erected anywhere in this section of the country. When contractors were asked to bid on the construction of that building, the Mellon-Steuart Co. was found to be the low bidder for the purpose of constructing the building.

The Mellon-Steuart Co. is largely owned by A. W. Mellon, who was Secretary of the Treasury at that time and was also chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. Other bidders could not compete with the Mellon-Steuart Co. There was too much aluminum used in the construction of that building, and they had a monopoly on aluminum, and if you will search the records you will find that the Mellon-Steuart Construction Co. received the contract to construct the building. In fact, I have a letter here from the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, D. C., and I ask unanimous consent that the letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, February 11, 1932.

Mr. H. H. B. MEYER,
Director Legislative Reference Service,
Library of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of February 10, and you are advised that the general contract for the construction of the building of the Pittsburgh branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland was awarded to the Mellon-Steuart Co., of Pittsburgh, which was the low bidder.

While several comparatively small contracts were also awarded covering miscellaneous items not included in the general contract, it is understood that the inquiry made of you relates to the latter.

Very truly yours,

CHESTER MORRILL, Secretary.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Federal Government has nothing to do with the building of Federal reserve bank buildings.

Mr. PATMAN. But the Federal Reserve Board, of which Mr. Mellon was chairman by virtue of his position as Secretary of the Treasury, passes on all plans and specifications, and the expenditure of such funds and all of the funds which the Federal reserve banks do not expend after a certain dividend is paid go into the Public Treasury.

Mr. BACON. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Empire State Building in New York City has used more aluminum than any other building, and that is managed by Al Smith.

Mr. PATMAN. I agree there are some private buildings using aluminum, but nothing like the public buildings. The Secretary of the Treasury had charge of the construction of the public buildings, and the gentleman will discover that more aluminum has been used in the construction of public buildings since he became Secretary of the Treasury than ever before.

I know of a case in Hot Springs, Ark., where a man went there to bid on the screens for a public building. He wanted to put the screens on the building. He traveled 125 miles to make a bid. He discovered that the specifications called for aluminum frames and he could not possibly bid, and he had to go back home. In Florida there is another case like that, where aluminum was specified in place of wood and steel.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. In just a moment I will.

Remember that material is being specified, displacing wood and steel, where there is competition in the furnishing of those materials, but there is no competition in the furnishing of aluminum, and the aluminum price was controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Is it possible that aluminum, as a building material, has very great merit and that it wins its place by merit?

Mr. PATMAN. Well, it should win by merit and not by political advantage.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. In the post-office building in my district that specification was written, and we got them to change it and include brass and bronze.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman states aluminum is being used very generally now in the construction of buildings because it has become cheap. A few years before Mr. Mellon became Secretary of the Treasury you could hardly afford to buy an aluminum vessel. Now you can get the same vessel in the 5-and-10-cent store.

Mr. PATMAN. It is not as cheap as it should be. It is protected by a high protective tariff.

I have mentioned one of the small things in connection with Mr. Mellon's activities, because the discussion was in order in the consideration of the bill now before the House. I now desire to discuss briefly the impeachment charges against the Secretary of the Treasury. While the Judiciary Committee was considering the charges the President appointed Mr. Mellon ambassador to England. The appointment was made within 24 hours after the printed hearings before the Judiciary Committee were available. It also came on the heels of Mr. Mellon's answer to the committee that he had sold his bank stock to his brother, R. B. Mellon, just before accepting the office of Secretary. It was a violation of the law for him to hold that office and also own bank stock, so he claims to have sold his stock to his brother, but resigned before the committee had an opportunity to investigate. The Pittsburgh, Pa., telephone directory discloses that during the time he was Secretary the joint office of A. W. and R. B. Mellon was in the Mellon National Bank Building, Pittsburgh, Pa., telephone, Atlantic 5800. This was also the Mellon National Bank telephone number. In a lawsuit involving the Aluminum Co. of America Mr. Mellon was a witness. This was in 1928. He was asked if he received any of the additional stock that was issued. He replied that he did not know. He was then asked if his brother, R. B. Mellon, received any of it. His answer was, "I do not know, but if he did I received some of it, too." This shows the close relationship between the one who is supposed to have sold the bank stock and the one who was supposed to have purchased it.

The World's Work, a magazine for March, 1932, discloses in an article entitled "My Brother and I," that the Mellon family owns and controls about $8,000,000,000 worth of property. Remember, we have much less than half this much money in circulation in the entire United States today. Remember, too, that his companies are using their surplus funds to buy up distressed properties belonging to their competitors that are ruined by this man-made depression.

Aluminum is highly protected by the tariff for Mr. Mellon's benefit. Oil has no tariff for Mr. Mellon's benefit.

I will not enumerate the impeachment charges. The printed hearings before the committee are available. I will give you my conclusions, which are fully authorized.

The President's action in appointing Mr. Mellon ambassador to England while impeachment charges were pending in the House was equal to granting a pardon to the accused while the jury is out.

My object in bringing impeachment charges against the Secretary of the Treasury was to get him out of that office, believing that he is an enemy of the plain people and that his policies have destroyed and are destroying an equal opportunity for individual citizens. No cyclone, plague, or epidemic of disease has wrought such havoc and caused such misery and suffering among people of a civilized nation as have been caused by this man's policies practiced upon a helpless people while they were undefended by their Chief Executives.

President Hoover, it is said, is the best President England has ever had. Now President Hoover is sending to England as our ambassador one who is recognized as England's best friend in America—excepting, of course, the President. We naturally think of the debt England owes us on loans secured during and after the war. He will get the United States to cancel its debt against England. I do not know what his reward will be. He secured for one of his companies a two-billion dollar oil concession in Colombia while he was Secretary of the Treasury.

Everybody knows that the ambassadorship was given to Mr. Mellon to get rid of him. It represents flight under fire, which is typical of the Harding appointees. Not only is he being run out of office, but he is being run out of the country. He is succeeded by a man who is thoroughly schooled in Mellon principles.

Our country has been suffering from "Mellonitis." The President, in an endeavor to protect the "melon," has partly relieved our country of "Mellonitis" without the operation that was about to be performed. The appointment, however, is a subterfuge for the purpose of saving the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Republican Party.

Our penitentiaries and jails are filled with people who have been convicted of offenses against the laws of the States and Nation on proof not so convincing and for crimes that were minor and insignificant compared with the proof against Mr. Mellon on serious offenses.

The President probably concluded that the people could not stand at this time the exposure of true conditions surrounding the activities of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The President has appointed himself a committee of one to exonerate Mr. Mellon, thereby removing the jurisdiction of the case from the House of Representatives.

The pardon has saved the Republican Party from a scandalous exposure that would rock the pillars of our Government. Teapot Dome was a molehill compared with the Mellon-acquired $2,000,000,000 Barco concession in Colombia.

Mr. Mellon has the consolation of knowing that he has violated more laws and that his policies have caused more suicides, undernourished children, and human suffering, and he has illegally acquired more property and done the most damage to the general welfare of the people than any other person on earth without fear of punishment, and with the sanction and approval of three Chief Executives of a civilized nation. As he goes to England with his bag of gold that has been wrenched from his innocent victims in America, our people may enjoy a sigh of relief and turn their thoughts to rebuilding our Nation for the benefit of the plain people—the ones who build our country in time of peace and who save our country in time of war.

Being successful of ridding our country of the active Mellon rule, it is almost as big a victory as wresting the Magna Charta from King John at Runnymede. Let us hope that his successor will not carry out his policies.

When Mr. Mellon was about to take the oath as ambassador he made this significant statement: "This isn't a marriage ceremony; it is a divorce."

The private debts of international bankers must be paid, according to the Mellonites.

Permission having been granted, I insert the following speech, delivered by myself, Member of Congress from the first congressional district of Texas, at Chicago, Ill., June 12, 1931, at 8 p. m., to a mass meeting arranged by the progressive Republicans of Illinois.

MELLONISM

Our country is suffering from an overdose of Mellonism. Our people are in the clutches of organized greed. The sponsors of the movement that brought on this depression and aggravated its condition upon the people are followers of the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon. Let us call them by their proper name. They are "Mellonites," regardless of whether they call themselves Democrats or Republicans. The three M's, to wit, Mellon, Morgan, and Mills, rate about 99 per cent on the question of running and controlling our Government. The three M's may well be said to represent, so far as the plain people and good government are concerned, misery, misfortune, and malfeasance. With all due respect to the President of the United States—for he is a victim of the reactionary leaders of the party to which he belongs—he is not the man who controls the policies and principles of the present administration. So far as his power goes, he is very little more than a mere hireling. Mr. Mellon is running this country, so far as the administration in power is concerned.

If Mr. Mellon's policies had been submitted to a vote of the people they would have been defeated by almost a unanimous vote. However, his policies have been put into effect through the administration in power contrary to the people's wishes. His policies have carried thousands of good, honest men and women to premature graves, caused suicides and starvation, wrecked and ruined homes and business institutions, and have caused children in many sections of this country to be underfed and undernourished.

Predatory wealth is in control of our Nation, and will remain in control as long as the present Secretary of the Treasury remains in office. This man is often referred to as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton. Those deluded citizens who really believe that must consider causing misery and distress to millions and placing tens of millions of people in a half-starved condition a great achievement. If one uses such a false standard to measure greatness, the Secretary of the Treasury should be hailed as the savior of our Nation. According to my view, he is the wage earners', farmers', veterans of all wars', and plain people's worst enemy in official life. He has not served under three Presidents, as many would have you to believe, but three Presidents have served under him. He doubtless accumulated more money during the World War, and by reason of the country's misery and misfortune, than any other war profiteer. Mellonism is an issue in our country, and will remain the issue until the plain people are given an opportunity to work and earn a living, to enjoy comforts and necessaries of life, and are given the rights and privileges they are entitled to receive as American citizens. Mellonism represents the essence of organized greed.

If anyone makes a fight against monopolies, trusts, and predatory wealth—which is really Mellonism—in favor of wage earners, farmers, defenders of our country in time of war and their dependents, and the plain people generally, he will be compelled to submit to abuse in the way of unfavorable publicity from the Mellonites of the Nation.

Organized greed is blind. The thought of "killing the goose that laid the golden egg" never occurs to them because they have no vision. The Good Book says that where there is no vision the people perish. During the last 10 years of Mellonism our country has been drifting without leadership, but in charge of organized greed. He who serves his generation must be in advance of it. The Mellonites, thinking only of self and personal gain, care nothing for the future generation. They are blinded by a screen of gold.

In 1921, when Mr. Mellon entered office, we had plenty of money in circulation; wages and products of the farm, orchard, and ranch were high. He wanted the reverse to be true. He has succeeded in making it so. We now have cheap labor and products, but high money, thereby making the rich richer and the poor poorer. Such a course has caused debts contracted when times were good to be doubled because it requires doubly amount of work to pay the debts. Interest rates have been doubled because it requires doubly amount of work to pay the interest. Taxes have been doubled, although the figures remain the same, because it requires doubly the amount of work to pay the taxes. Telephone, electric-light, water, and gas bills are doubled because it requires doubly the amount of work to pay the bills. This error which has been so expensive to the people can be corrected.

IMPEACHMENT OF MELLON

I announced some time ago that when Congress meets I expect to file in the House of Representatives impeachment charges against the Secretary of the Treasury. The only constitutional and legal way to oust a public official from public office is for the House to impeach him and the Senate to sit as a jury for the purpose of trial and convict him of the charges. Much has been said in the past about the legal disqualifications of Mr. Mellon to hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury, but never before has anyone announced a plan for his impeachment, which, if carried out, would get results. Heretofore, such agitation has been in a body that was powerless to act—the Senate of the United States.

Section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States provides as follows:

"No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury * * * shall directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce or be the owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel * * * and every person who offends against any of the prohibitions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000 and shall, upon conviction, be removed from office and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States * * *."

Senator MCKELLAR, March 5, 1929, introduced a resolution in the Senate, which was adopted, requiring the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into and report to the Senate whether Andrew W. Mellon may legally hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury. No action was ever taken on the report of that committee. The reason is evident. The Senate could not adopt the report of the Members who believed Mr. Mellon to be qualified to hold the office because that would be, in effect, prejudging a case which they had no right to pass on. The Senate can only pass on the qualifications of a public official in the event articles of impeachment are presented by the House of Representatives. The Senate could not adopt the report or take any action on the report submitted by the members of the committee who reported that Mr. Mellon was holding office in violation of the law. The adoption of such a report would have no effect whatever and would merely be prejudging any case of impeachment that the House might later submit.

When the House is organized I expect to submit the question of impeachment of Mr. Mellon. Under the rules of the House of Representatives, such a resolution will be privileged. The customary gag rule of the reactionary Republicans can not be used. They will be compelled to face the issue.

Positive proof of Mr. Mellon's disqualifications will be presented to the House of Representatives. I do not see how any Member can vote against his impeachment without, at the same time, violating his own oath of office, because Mr. Mellon, in holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury, is violating the laws of the United States. As suggested in the report of Senators NORRIS, CARAWAY, WALSH, and BLAINE, holding Mr. Mellon disqualified, "Law enforcement should commence at the top." The following is a part of what they said on law enforcement in connection with this subject:

"LAW ENFORCEMENT

"Just at the present time a great deal is being said about law enforcement. From the public press it is learned that the President of the United States has appointed, or is about to appoint, a commission to study the subject with a view of bringing about better enforcement of our laws. If we expect to enforce the law generally as to the citizens of our country, why have we not the same right to ask that our statesmen and our public officials should be weighed in the same balance? And is it not true that the ordinary citizen will not have the same respect for law generally if he understands that a plain statute is being violated by those in control of the Government itself? Why not begin our law enforcement at the top?"

Without going into details I will say that it is admitted that Mr. Mellon and his brothers completely dominate and control one of the largest corporations of its kind in the world. Such corporation or holding company has a large number of subsidiaries not only in this country but in many foreign countries. This concern owns 34 sea vessels. No one can possibly contend that Mr. Mellon, as owner of one-third of this corporation, is not a part owner of a sea vessel in violation of section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States of America. Of course, the resolution calling for his impeachment will contain other charges and all of them will be well supported by facts.

Mr. Mellon was a director in more than 300 corporations at the time he was appointed Secretary of the Treasury. He resigned as director and contends that since he is only a voting stockholder of these corporations he is not interested or concerned in carrying on their business either directly or indirectly. Many of his concerns are interested directly in the tariff, in the levying and collection of Federal taxes, and in shipping products upon the high seas. He has granted to his corporations millions of dollars in tax refunds. Recently Hon. C. N. Haskell, former Governor of Oklahoma, made this statement: "Usually brothers and cousins of Mr. Mellon are known to the business as directors and managers of his numerous corporations. But he is the big share owner and presses the button."

If we are successful in ridding our country of Mr. Mellon's rule, it will be as big a victory as wresting the Magna Charta from King John at Runnymede.

CONCENTRATION OF WEALTH

Senator BORAH says that 80 per cent of the wealth of our Nation is owned by 4 per cent of the people. A cartoon was recently published in Labor, a newspaper of national wide circulation, as follows:

"Let five apples represent all the wealth in the Nation. Let 100 people represent the entire population of the United States. The 96 people would have one apple and four very rich people would have an apple apiece."

During the year of 1929, the last year we have a statistical income-tax report, the net earnings of 504 individuals in the United States amounted to as much as the total gross value of all the cotton and wheat produced in America during the year of 1930. Thirty-six of these individuals had a net income greater than the total gross value of all the farm products produced by all the farmers in Texas, the greatest agricultural State in the Union during 1930. Mr. Mellon is the head of the Federal reserve system. Money is to the body politic what blood is to the human body. We have in our Nation to-day $1,000,000,000 less money in circulation than we had in 1920, although we have 17,000,000 more people in the United States to-day than we had in 1920. The per capita circulation of money has reduced from $53 in 1921 to $36 now. One had just as well expect his body to remain well and efficient after the withdrawal of one-third of his circulating blood as to expect his country to remain prosperous after the withdrawal from circulation of one-third of the country's money. In 1873, during one of the hardest panics the United States has ever suffered, France was prosperous because she had more than $40 of money per capita in circulation. The people of the United States were hard pressed because they had a much smaller amount of money in circulation. Since 1929, France has been prosperous and has been importing laborers into her country because she had more than $50 per capita money in circulation. During the same time, the people of the United States have been suffering, and more laborers have been leaving our country than have been coming in, because our per capita circulation has been one-third less than the per capita circulation of money in France. Mr. Mellon, as the dominating and controlling power of the Federal reserve system, has more to do with the per capita circulation of money than any other one person in America.

EQUALIZING THE BURDENS OF THE LAST WAR

I am not, at this time, thinking so much about equalizing the burdens of the next war. Many of the large fortunes, from which incomes from $1,000,000 to $60,000,000 a year are now being made, were accumulated during the World War by reason of the country's misery and misfortune. During this time, 5,000,000 men were baring their breasts to enemies' bullets, and offering to give their last drop of blood for the cause of their country, without the payment of any profit whatsoever or without hope of financial reward. We have the names and addresses, and know the approximate amounts accumulated by these individuals during the World War. Why should we look to other sources of revenue to pay the expenses of the last war until this source of revenue that should be used for that purpose is, in a large measure, exhausted? It is yet possible to make the war profiteers of the last war pay the larger part, if not all, of the expenses of that war. If, in carrying out the purpose of making the profiteers of the last war pay its expenses, it is found to be expensive and burdensome upon the class that now holds the greater portion of the wealth of our Nation, a future war will be less likely. I believe that he who profits most should pay most.

DEPRESSION

The word "depression" is used while the Republicans are in power and the word "panic" is considered more fitting while the Democrats are in power. The following recently appeard in the Pathfinder, a national publication, written by J. G. Calhoun, Julia, Ga.:

"There are many Hoovercrats standing in the bread line. You can tell them by their foolish expression. Hoover had us on short rations once before. He has us there again and it looks like he is going to keep us there."

During the Hoover campaign, the people of the United States were led to believe that in the event of his election he would open up wonderful foreign markets and the people of the United States could produce twice as much and still not supply the demand. Consequently, the early part of 1929, people all over the United States commenced to put their money in the stock market. The big rich, the owners of the stock, knew that there were no foreign markets and fed their stocks to the anxious investors, who were fooled by the foreign-markets propaganda. The theme song of Wall Street is "Bringing in the Sheep." When the stocks were finally owned principally by the small investors and America's vast middle-class citizenship and they were forced to commence buying from one another, the market broke and now the ultrarich can repurchase their stocks for 10 per cent to 50 per cent of what they sold them for in the latter part of 1929.

Mr. Hoover recently made a speech in which he stated that the war caused the depression. Did the World War take money out of circulation? No. Did the World War destroy independent business institutions in this country, perpetrate monopolies and trusts, and destroy individual opportunity? No.

Mr. Mellon recently made a speech, which was devoid of any cure for the depression. The crowd that Mr. Mellon wants to see prosper is prospering now. He can't promise them any more prosperity than they are now enjoying. A famous card player used to say, when he was prospering and the losers were complaining about his cheating in a game of poker, "It is music to the gambler's ears to hear the suckers squeal." Doubtless it is music to Mr. Mellon's ears to hear the cries of men, women, and children in the agony of their distress and agony brought on by his activities, which is lining his pockets with gold.

TRUSTS AND MONOPOLIES

A trust is a combination to restrict competition and create a monopoly. A monopoly has such a control of a commodity as to allow prices to be raised.

Mr. Mellon's administration does not believe in enforcing the laws against his big companies that are violating the antitrust laws of our Nation. The Attorney General of the United States is another one of his satellites. The Attorney General never brings a suit against the violators of the antitrust laws in a way that anyone will be compelled to go to jail or pay a fine in the event the Government wins the suit. It is always one of these "friendly suits" to test the law—a law that has been tested in more ways than any other law upon our statute books. An Attorney General who doesn't know the antitrust laws after reading the numerous decisions that fill volumes of law books on the act should be impeached for incompetency. The Attorney General has engaged in a "wrist-slapping" campaign with trusts and monopolies and is using his office and the courts of the United States as an agency of convenience for their benefit.

WHAT A TRUST OR A MONOPOLY CAN DO AND WHAT THEY ARE DOING

1. Destroy independent business.
2. Cut wages and cause a lower standard of living.
3. Unduly increase the price that the consumer must pay.
4. Place their factories in different sections of the world or in different sections of the United States in order that labor may be effectively dealt with. In one plant where laborers demand better wages or better working conditions, they are told to be satisfied or that particular plant will be closed down and another one in a different section where the laborers can be more easily dealt with will be operated.
5. Pay the president of a company $2,000,000 a year and even directors $300,000 a year, entirely out of proportion to the value of the services rendered.
6. Set low prices on the raw materials so that these big salaries and other extravagant expenses can be paid.
7. Take money out of circulation and hoard it in the banks of New York. One certain monopoly has $400,000,000 on deposit in New York now. It is not in circulation. This concern represents what was formerly 5,000 different unit companies in the United States. If the 5,000 different units had this money now, it would be in circulation and not hoarded in the banks of one big city.
8. Inflate values of their properties and require the people to pay a return upon watered stocks and bonds.
9. Place property rights above human rights.

UNEMPLOYMENT

More than 7,000,000 people in the United States to-day are able, willing, and anxious to work, but can not find jobs. The American people are not lazy. They are accused of producing too much. It looks like they produce so much to eat they starve. They produce so much to wear they can not buy clothes. If the plain people of our Nation are allowed to prosper, everybody will prosper. We can not longer depend upon prosperity coming from the billionaire class; it fails to percolate through on down to the masses. There is a feeling that a man has a right to steal rather than that he or his family should suffer the pains and penalties of hunger and poverty when he is anxious, able, and willing to work but can not find a job. If Congress would meet and the Members would forget political parties and think of their country's welfare, laws could be passed within a period of a few weeks that would give everybody a job who wanted a job and put our country back in a prosperous condition. The unemployed could be put to work building highways, waterways, and public buildings. This is not going to be done if the Mellonites can prevent it. It would possibly cost the 4 per cent who own the Nation's wealth a little money.

The appeals for a special session when made to Mr. Hoover are made to the wrong person. It is useless to present such appeals to Mr. Mellon. It would be much easier to convert Clarence Darrow to the cause of Christianity than it would be to convert Mr. Mellon to the cause of the plain people. Mr. Mellon and many of his coconspirators against the public welfare are reputed to be enjoying incomes of from thirty to fifty million dollars a year. This is reputed to be their net incomes. I doubt that Mr. Mellon ever witnessed people suffering distress or poverty. Any man who sees men, women, and children in distress has a soft heart. An income of $30,000,000 a year is equal to an income of $100,000 for each working day. Mr. Mellon's salary as Secretary of the Treasury is $15,000 a year.

COUNTRY ABOVE PARTY

Every good citizen should think more of his country than he does any political party. The Mellonites think more of the reactionary Republican crowd because they are using that organization to promote their selfish and organized greed to the detriment and distress of the plain people—the ones who build our country in time of peace and who save it during the time of war.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Three million five hundred thousand veterans of the World War, who served longer than 110 days, hold adjusted-service certificates. The average value of each certificate is $1,010. Congress recently passed an act which permitted each veteran whose certificate has been issued more than two years to borrow an amount equal to 50 per cent of the face value thereof. Under this act and under the old law which permitted the veterans to borrow a small sum each year, approximately a billion dollars have been borrowed by the veterans from the Government on their certificates. This money has relieved much distress among veterans and helped the country by increasing the circulating medium. Much is being said about our present deficit in the United States Treasury and some newspapers and periodicals are trying to lead the people to believe that the deficit is caused by the veterans' loan bill. This is absolutely false. Not one dime of this deficit was caused by the Government loaning to the veterans a part of their own money. There was already in the Treasury approximately $800,000,000 in a reserve fund to retire these certificates upon death of the holders or maturity, which doubtless was used to make these loans. That amount, together with what was borrowed from the war-risk insurance fund, was sufficient to make loans without going to the Treasury for a penny.

Do not call the adjusted-service certificates a "bonus" unless you call them a "so-called bonus." I will admit that the word "bonus" is the popular name, but a very misleading one. The word was coined by the enemies of the veterans. The adjusted-service certificates do not represent a bonus. They represent an honest debt, which has been publicly confessed by the Congress of the United States to these veterans of the World War for services rendered.

During the war the private soldiers received $30 a month for home service and a 10 per cent increase for service overseas. But each soldier had deducted from his pay each month allotments to dependent ones; deductions for altering and repairing his clothing and shoes; deductions for laundry, tailoring, and barber bills; deductions of an average of $6.60 a month for insurance; deductions for installments on Liberty bonds. A majority of soldiers drew only a few dollars a month after these deductions were made, and a large percentage did not draw anything at all.

During the war, alien slackers and alien enemies in America, who were exempt from military service, received from $15 to $70 a day working in Government shipyards and munition plants. More than 33,000 millionaires were made during the World War, and by reason of the country's misery and misfortune.

During the war, many soldiers worked on the public roads in America, side by side with civilians. Immediately after the war was over, Congress passed a law which adjusted the pay of these soldiers, sailors, and marines on road-construction work. The corporal, who drew $1.66½ a day, who was used as a tractor mechanic, side by side with a civilian, who drew $8 a day, had his pay adjusted and he received adjusted pay equal to $6.33 a day for each day he so worked, or $158.25 a month. I have in my possession a copy of one of the pay rolls. It is included in my remarks made in the House of Representatives, January 17, 1931.

The railroads were drafted into the service during the World War. They were guaranteed a profit equal to the average returns of the railroads during the preceding three years—the most prosperous time of railroading in America. This is a case of where property rights were guaranteed a return and a fair return. Not satisfied with this, the railroad owners persuaded Congress to give them adjusted pay after the war was over which amounted to money and property of the value of more than $1,500,000,000. Remember, this was adjusted pay for the railroads. They were paid in cash or its equivalent.

More than 7,000 war contractors, who did not hold legal contracts from the Government to make supplies during the war, but most of whom held verbal contracts from the dollar-a-year men, who represented in many instances the industries controlled and owned by these dollar-a-year men, persuaded Congress to adjust their pay. Congress passed a law which provided for the adjustment of their pay, and under this law billions of dollars of adjusted compensation was paid out to these war contractors. Mr. Mellon received his millions from these adjustments.

A large part of the money that was raised through Liberty loan drives in America during the war was loaned to our allies. After the war Congress adjusted these debts and gave to these foreign nations what was equal to an outright gift or subsidy from the Treasury of the United States equal to $10,000,000,000. These foreign countries used our own money to pay their World War soldiers not only adjusted compensation but bonuses aggregating in some instances as high as $7,290 each.

Congress felt disposed to give our soldiers adjusted compensation. A law was passed in 1924 confessing a debt to each veteran of the World War who served more than 60 days of a dollar a day for home service and $1.25 a day for service overseas for extra compensation or extra pay. Veterans who served more than 60 days but less than 110 days were paid in cash. By reason of false statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is the present occupant of that position, Congress was led to believe in 1924 that our Nation could not afford to pay this debt in cash. Consequently, the veterans were given a Government's "I O U," or post-dated check, or due bill, due in 20 years—1945—sometimes referred to as the "tombstone bonus."

This debt should have been paid in cash, and had it not been for the false statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, I am sure it would have been. The railroads, war contractors, and foreign nations were well taken care of when our country owed a $26,000,000,000 national debt. No one suggested we were not able to take care of these payments. Years later, when our national debt had been decreased considerably, the Secretary of the Treasury contended that the Treasury of the country could not possibly stand the payment of the debt to the soldiers for services rendered.

Congress, more than 10 years ago, outlined, by law, how our national debt should be retired. Had Mr. Mellon followed this law, instead of having a billion dollar deficit in the Treasury today, we would have a two and one-half billion dollar surplus. I heard the Secretary of the Treasury admit, in answer to a question before the Senate committee in January of this year, that he had paid three and one-half billion dollars more on the national debt during the past decade than Congress, by law, said that he should pay. Our national debt has been reduced from $26,000,000,000 to $16,000,000,000 the last 10 years. We owe less than any country on earth in proportion to wealth. Three and one-half billion dollars is the amout of the aggregate face value of all the adjusted-service certificates. If we pay them in full now, our country will not be in debt one dime more than Congress said 10 years ago it should be in debt at this time.

Our Nation has a property valuation of more than $500,000,000,000. There is a balance due on the adjusted service certificates of about two and one-half billion dollars, equal to one-half of 1 per cent of our total property valuation.

During the last few years, Mr. Mellon has refunded to the United States Steel Corporation, Aluminum Company of America and other war profiteers billions of dollars in taxes claimed to have been overpaid during the World War. When the United States Steel Corporation was refunded more than a hundred million dollars, it was also paid interest on the amount alleged to have been overpaid from the time that it was overpaid at 6 per cent. If we will pay the veterans of the World War the amount that Congress confessed was due as of the time the services were rendered, with 6 per cent interest since that time compounded annually, the full face value of the certificates is due now. The veterans have been paying 6 per cent interest and more compounded annually for their own money. It would therefore not be unfair for the Government to pay them 6 per cent compounded annually.

The individuals who profited the most by reason of our country's misery and misfortune during the recent war should be compelled to pay this bill. It can be paid without changing our tax laws or increasing our taxes in any way. The money will go to every nook and corner of the United States. It will increase the circulating medium, which will carry with it increased purchasing power. It must be paid sometime. It is due now, and it will do the veterans and the country the most good if paid now.

One certain weekly magazine has bitterly opposed the Government paying this honest debt and has criticized Congress for permitting the veterans to borrow a part of their own money. The stockholders of this particular magazine received 71 per cent dividends on their original investment last year. The magazine was transported by the United States mails. For every 7 cents it cost the Government to transport these magazines the magazine company paid 2 cents and the people paid the other 5. By reason of this direct subsidy to this particular magazine its stockholders were enabled to make a profit of 71 per cent on their original investment. It is people like these who are always talking about the soldiers' bonus or subsidy and referring to their efforts to get an honest debt paid as a "bonus racket." The Government has lost each year tens of millions of dollars on the transportation of the magazines that are now having so much to say in their columns about Congress authorizing the loan to the veterans of 50 per cent of their own money at 4½ per cent interest. The Government is making millions of dollars a year lending the veterans their own money. The interest charged them will practically consume the remainder of their certificates.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS LAW

When the next session of Congress convenes a determined effort should be made by the veterans of the World War to secure the enactment of a widows and orphans' pension measure for widows and orphans of veterans of the World War. Under the present laws a widow of a Spanish-American War veteran draws $30 a month, although her husband died of a disability in no way connected with his service. A surviving widow of a veteran of the World War who died of a disability not connected with his service draws nothing. The same injustice prevails with reference to children of deceased veterans of the two wars. This should be corrected by giving widows and orphans of veterans of the World War the same benefits as those now enjoyed by widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War.

GIVE THE PEOPLE THE TRUTH

Voters are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely. The Hon. CORDELL HULL, of Tennessee, recently made this statement:

"If the people, as in the better days of this Republic, would take one night off each week from pleasure and recreation and assemble in every schoolhouse and other convenient buildings in America for a full discussion of our Government—Federal and State and local—the political problems, the conduct and attitude of each public official, I guarantee that government in this Nation would be improved 100 per cent within three years."

Senator HULL is right. I, like Thomas Jefferson, believe in the honesty of the people and believe that all is to be won by appealing to the reason of the voters.

The people are very patient; they are reasonable; what they do after consideration and free discussion is right. They are not going to put up with conditions as they are without entering a serious protest. Several prominent citizens of our Nation have already suggested that we are going to have a revolution, either of ballots or bullets. If the President of the United States fails to call Congress in special session for the purpose of making an effort to remedy conditions, and if the heel of organized greed continues to crush the plain citizens of our country, I shudder to think of what the consequences might be. We have the greatest Government on earth. We are suffering by reason of the wrong governmental philosophy of those at the top. The serious questions we are confronting are not partisan questions and should not be considered in a partisan way. We should rise above party and make an honest effort to solve them. The best citizen thinks more of his country than he does of any political party.

The lines of Gerald Massey are applicable to present conditions:

"Oh men, bowed down with labor,
Oh women, young yet old,
Oh hearts oppressed in the toilers' breast
And crushed with the power of gold.
Keep on with your weary struggle Against triumphant might;
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] has to some extent taken the edge off the attack made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] upon Mr. Mellon and has completely exonerated Mr. Wetmore as Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

It was simply Mr. Wetmore's great ability that caused him to be retained in his present position year after year and through administration after administration of both parties. It was his ability as an executive and his thorough understanding of the building business that caused him to be retained in office, but under a technicality of the law, requiring an architect, he could not be appointed supervising architect. So he has continued as Acting Supervising Architect, but it amount to the same thing so far as his duties are concerned.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. My recollection is, it was in 1916 that a vacancy occurred in the Office of Supervising Architect. Mr. Wetmore had been there a number of years, and I think his profession originally was that of law. He was made Acting Supervising Architect and has been in that position ever since.

Mr. TILSON. And he has been a very capable official, as everyone knows who is acquainted with his work.

Mr. BYRNS. And I happen to know that he has served with particular ability.

Mr. TILSON. I think almost everybody recognizes that fact.

Mr. BYRNS. We have found that to be the fact.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Just for a question, because I wish to turn to another subject for a moment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to say that if somebody does not qualify under the law that he should be permitted, because of other qualities that may be very superior, to do that which he can not do under the law?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, as Acting Supervising Architect Mr. Wetmore does just the same work he would do as Supervising Architect. It is simply a difference in name and that is all it amounts to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think when the law was passed that it was expected, while the law was permitted to remain on the books, that an architect should fill that position?

Mr. TILSON. The law has remained ever since.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And that he should possess technical knowledge and experience in that line of work.

Mr. TILSON. I think his ability has been proven.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to revert for a moment to the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

I think the gentleman from Texas puts his talents to very poor use in attacking Andrew W. Mellon. It happens that Mr. Mellon for 11 years served this Nation as Secretary of the Treasury. That his service in that capacity was not only honest, faithful, and efficient, but to a notable degree outstanding in its character is gratefully acknowledged by millions of his fellow citizens.

Before he came to that high position he was engaged in very large business enterprises. He had accumulated a large fortune, so that the amount of his salary as Secretary meant nothing to him, and yet he gave up active connections with all private business in order to serve his country. He came into office with the highest possible qualifications for the duties of the office because his entire business career had been the best possible training for it. The results have been so satisfactory to the people of this country, and especially to the Treasury, that he has been hailed all over the country as one of the greatest Secretaries of the Treasury in all our national history.

He has served this Government for 11 years unstintedly, to the sacrifice of his own business; although perhaps this meant less to him than to most men because of his age and because he had already reached that degree of private fortune that left him no worries so far as a competence is concerned. At any rate, it can not be denied that he gave himself unselfishly and most effectively to his country's service.

As a most fitting recognition of Mr. Mellon's services as Secretary of the Treasury, he has been promoted, as it were, to be ambassador to the Court of St. James. His name went to the Senate for confirmation, and almost without a dissenting voice, certainly without a call for a record vote, he was confirmed by the Senate, the very body that would have had to sit as a court in the trial of the impeachment charges brought by the gentleman from Texas, in his 1-man attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury, had they been presented by the House.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I prefer not to yield. The gentleman had 10 minutes, and I think he used the time for an unworthy purpose.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will yield for a question.

Mr. TILSON. I shall not promise. The gentleman may object if he wishes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks for three minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, but I hope the gentleman will yield to me to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I made no promise to yield, but I will yield to the gentleman for one question.

Mr. PATMAN. The same law that disqualified Mr. Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury did not disqualify him as ambassador to the Court of St. James. I hope the gentleman will take that into consideration.

Mr. TILSON. There has never been a law to disqualify Mr. Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury. It seems that the gentleman has worked himself up into such a state of mind in connection with his proposed impeachment charges that his attack hardly deserves answer. It reminds me of an old Yale professor, under whose tutelage I sat for some time. He said that many formidable questions and apparently plausible statements might be answered and completely disposed of by the Yankee device of asking two other questions, and I think the gentleman's argument could very largely be answered in the same way. The two questions are, first, Is what the gentleman states true? If by any means he should be able to establish the truth of the statement or any substantial part of it, then the second question is, What of it?

In the present instance the gentleman has failed to bring a scintilla of evidence that any of his charges or any of his insinuations or innuendos are true; and, in the next place, even if it were true, for instance, that aluminum has been recommended by a certain group of architects as good material for use in building, what of it? Aluminum in its production and use has had a wonderful development. It has proved itself to be a fine material for building, but Mr. Mellon has not been giving his attention to aluminum. He has given himself unstintedly and wholly to the duties of his great office. The idea that Andrew W. Mellon with his record, reputation, and prestige before the American people and the whole world, for that matter, would stultify himself and prostitute the high office of Secretary of the Treasury to the ignoble purpose of private greed is simply too preposterous to be seriously entertained for a moment by any fair-minded person.

Mr. PATMAN. If I did not make a sufficient case against Mr. Mellon before the Judiciary Committee, why did he leave at the time he did?

Mr. TILSON. Because it was just at this time he received the great honor of promotion to the highest position in the diplomatic corps. Evidently neither the President, Mr. Mellon, nor anyone else regarded as worthy of serious attention the vague charges brought by the gentleman. Whether or not the gentleman's attack was calculated to amount to anything if taken to the Senate in the form of impeachment proceedings was pretty thoroughly settled by the same Members of this tribunal who would have had to hear and decide the case, when they almost unanimously—Democrats, Republicans, and others—joined in confirming Mr. Mellon for the highest position in the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman should remember that the committee had to quit the case, because there was nothing else to do. The President appointed him to this office, which was equal to a presidential pardon during trial. The committee could not do anything else.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman's attack had nothing to do with the appointment; but if all the things charged by the gentleman had been true, or it had been believed that there was any foundation whatever for them, the Senate of the United States would not have confirmed him.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph for the purpose of getting recognition. We are on a section having to do with the Supervising Architect. About four years ago the Congress, seeing the necessity for it, authorized an appropriation of $3,825,000 for the purchase of a site and construction of a public building in St. Louis. The present Federal building was constructed over 50 years ago. We are paying $70,000 a year in rent to the owners of private buildings in St. Louis to house Government agencies. As time went on and the architect worked on the plans, it was discovered that they would need an additional $1,245,000 to construct a building sufficient in size to care for the present Government agency in St. Louis. Last summer I took this matter up with the Supervising Architect's Office, and it was placed before the Bureau of the Budget. I was informed that it was approved by the Bureau of the Budget. Later on, in view of the condition of the Treasury, the President saw fit to issue orders that no additional legislation was coming down from the Bureau of the Budget at this session of Congress with reference to public buildings. I made some investigation and found that there are 19 projects in the country somewhat similar to the one in St. Louis, and that additional funds will be needed for some of them in order to construct the proper kind of buildings and additional legislation for others. I invited the Members representing the cities where the 19 projects are located to discuss the matter. We went to the Bureau of the Budget and stated our case. The director promised to take the matter up with the President. I then appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and told that committee the situation with reference to these projects, of course especially with reference to my own. I asked the committee if it would not discuss the matter with Mr. Martin, the assistant to Mr. Heath and Mr. Wetmore, when they came before the committee, because, as you all know, the officials of the Government are not permitted to discuss matters not in the Budget recommendations unless the committee brings the subject up. The Committee on Appropriations did as I suggested. I will place the hearings in my extension of remarks. They showed that these are old projects, not new projects, and showed that all that is asked is an authorization, in some instances, for additional money, in others for legislation simply to change the location of the site or something like that. The total amount involved in the 19 projects is $5,000,000, and not one dollar is asked until 1934; but in order to proceed properly with the plans and specifications, authorization is needed now.

I say, in the interest of economy the Bureau of the Budget should have sent down the recommendation, because if they do not construct the buildings now, especially in St. Louis, where they are going to construct a 6-story building, later, when they provide for the other four stories it will cost much more than $5,000,000 to complete the work.

Mr. Chairman, it is not only a foolish piece of business, as far as the St. Louis office is concerned, but it is a foolish piece of business as far as every one of the 19 projects are concerned. They are old projects. We do not want a dollar, I say, until 1934. In no way does it affect the balancing of the Budget in 1933. I hope the administration will bring down this recommendation when the deficiency bill is pending. There is one more thing I would like to say about the St. Louis building. When that building is constructed in St. Louis it will cost $5,000,000 completed. The old building will be sold, and the appraisers say it will bring about $5,000,000. It is the most valuable block of ground in St. Louis, and the new building is not, in the end, going to cost the Government of the United States one penny.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. Since this does not cost any money, why does the gentleman not offer an amendment to put this item in the bill at this time?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman that the expert parliamentarian of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Shield, has advised me that it would be subject to a point of order. Therefore I will not offer the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a brief from the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks I include the record of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations. You will see the department thinks the legislation necessary, as do the members of the committee, Mr. BYRNS and Mr. WOOD included.

PROJECTS WHICH REQUIRE AMENDED LEGISLATION

The CHAIRMAN. I understand there are some 15 large buildings with respect to which a limit of cost has been fixed, but conditions have arisen requiring either additional plans or changes in limits of cost. The St. Louis project was brought to our attention by Congressman COCHRAN of Missouri.

Mr. MARTIN. We have 19 projects which, in the opinion of the department, will require some form of amended legislation sooner or later. These projects are scattered all over the country. I can give you an example of the different categories into which they fall.

The CHAIRMAN. You might tell us where they are.

Mr. MARTIN. I have them in a statement which I am going to furnish for the record. We report those every month.

We have a project in St. Louis and another in St. Paul, very large projects. The estimate of cost which has been authorized contemplated a 6-story building in St. Louis and a 6-story building in St. Paul. As the plans were started, the several departments made a material increase in their space demands. In one of these cities the increase was 37 per cent and in the other 48 per cent. The department has in mind so designing these two buildings that you can add additional stories at some later date, because we can not, of course, exceed the authorization.

At St. Louis it will be necessary to put four additional stories on at some later date, and St. Paul five additional stories.

Of course, there is a further matter; there will be an additional cost by doing the jobs in two bites, but sooner or later you will need some form of amended legislation to allow us to complete the job to meet the requirements.

Then we have several places where we are about to select the site, but we can not acquire title until we get authority from Congress to accept title subject to rights to mine minerals under the site or an easement that requires the maintenance of a sewer that runs across the site, and so forth.

The absence of that authority is likely to hold up those jobs until we get amended legislation.

Then we have several projects where the present legislation contemplates an addition to the present building. A more thorough study by the architects indicates that that is not the best way to meet that problem, that you probably should consider a new building rather than to expend a large sum on extending and remodeling an old structure.

At Grand Rapids, Mich., we have authority for an extension of the present building of $300,000. The extension was limited because of the area we had on the Government site to the rear of the present building. The present building is a beautiful building, not so very old. However, we could obtain enough space to meet the requirements at this time. As we started the plans, the city advised us that it was their intention to widen that street at the rear 25 feet and it would have to come off the Government side. That fact absolutely made it necessary to consider some other plan, because we should not expend money for small additions like that, and the building being of marble I believe it would be a very costly proposition. So the more forward-looking solution there is to acquire a site and build a work-type building for the parcel post of the post office and utilize the remaining space in the present building for all other activities. Such a project will take care of the city for a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it be possible, Mr. Martin, for you to take each one of those projects and make a statement as to just why each one is being held up?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

"ST. PAUL, MINN.

"Limit of cost authorized, $2,700,000. Federal activities proposed to be housed in the new building have increased their requirements 37 per cent above the amount on which the present limit of cost was based. To provide this additional space, change facing of building to all stone and install mail-handling apparatus will require an increase in the present limit of cost of $1,000,000. In the absence of amended legislation, the department will construct a 6-story building so designed that five additional stories may be added at some future date.

"PHOENIX, ARIZ.

"Limit of cost, $1,080,000. Under this legislation it was proposed to acquire a site and construct a building for a post office and a number of other Federal activities excepting the courts, and five other activities which were to remain in the present Federal building after remodeling. Since the estimate for the new building was prepared, Federal activities have increased their requirements 1,400 square feet, and the architectural plans developed show an increase over the original estimate of 11,000 square feet. The courts have requested air conditioning and space in the proposed new building which can not be furnished unless the present limit of cost is increased $545,000. The several amounts which would offset this increase would be the cost of remodeling present building, $40,000; rented quarters during remodeling, $20,000; sale value of Federal property estimated at $250,000, and additional cost of adding additional stories at some later date, $35,000. In the absence of amended legislation, the department proposes to construct a 3-story building so designed that three additional stories may be added at some future date.

"HAVRE, MONT.

"Original limit of cost was $200,000. Amended to provide for courts under limit of cost of $250,000. The contract was awarded under the original limit in advance of amended legislation, and bids for the additional court space exceeded the new limit by approximately $46,000. Deduction changes were made in an amount to complete the building within the new limit. Major deductions considered eliminated two wings at the second floor level and the installation of the elevator. A further increase of $40,000 is necessary to reinstate these omissions.

"GRAND ISLAND, NEBR.

"Limit of cost for additional land and extension $95,000. Federal activities have increased their space requirements nearly 5,000 square feet, necessitating a much larger extension than contemplated under the present legislation. Estimate for additional land was $25,000. Report of condemnation commission, $34,500. Increase necessary to furnish all space, $90,000.

"HUNTINGTON, W. VA.

"Limit of cost for additional land and extension, $390,000. Federal activities have increased their space requirements approximately 9,000 square feet since legislation was obtained. In order to provide this additional space, it is estimated that an increase of $75,000 in the limit of cost is necessary.

"PEORIA, ILL.

"The present legislation contemplates acquisition of additional land and extension to the present building under a limit of cost of $320,000. Since the legislation was obtained a more thorough examination of the building has been made and the Office of the Supervising Architect considers that the more economical and forward-looking solution at this place is for the acquisition of a larger block of additional land, demolition of the present structure, and the construction of a new building on the present site extended. An increase of $630,000 will be necessary in the limit of cost to carry out this scheme.

"GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

"Limit of cost of $300,000 contemplated the extension and remodeling of the present building. The city of Grand Rapids proposes to widen the street in the rear of the present post office, which will require a strip off the rear of the present Federal site. Work has been held up on the plans of this extension because of this fact, and it is recognized that the obvious method for accommodating all activities at Grand Rapids is to acquire a site and construct a building thereon for postal activities, the present building to be remodeled for other activities. To accomplish this change will require an increase of $425,000 in the present limit of cost.

"ALAMOSA, COLO.

"Limit of cost of $90,000 contemplates the construction of a building on a site to be donated. Site offered as a donation is not suitable. To carry out this project it is necessary to acquire a site by purchase, which will necessitate an increase in the limit of cost of $15,000.

"DUQUESNE, PA.

"Limit of cost of $100,000 provided for a building on a site to be donated. Site offered by the city is an interior plot of insufficient frontage. This location is suitable and the purchase of the adjacent corner property will make it a very satisfactory site. To proceed with this project, it will be necessary to increase the present limit of cost by $45,000.

"HIBBING, MINN.

"Limit of cost, $135,000. A site has been selected but title to same can not be accepted because of reservations to mine coal and other minerals. In order to proceed with this project, it is necessary that legislation permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to accept title subject to such reservations be enacted.

"RENO, NEV.

"Legislation contemplates a site and building. A part of the site selected is subject to easements for the maintenance, repair, and replacement of a sewer and an irrigation ditch extending across the entire site. In order to acquire all the land comprising the site, it is necessary that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to accept title to a certain portion of the site subject to easement.

"CALUMET, MICH.

"Legislation contemplates acquisition of a site and the construction of a building under a total limit of cost of $120,000. Site selected by Treasury and Post Office agents is the location of the present leased postal quarters, the entire site, building, and equipment being offered to the Government for $19,000. The purchase of this property, refacing and remodeling of the building, is estimated to cost $45,000. No action can be taken toward this purchase until present legislation is amended.

"JACKSON, MISS.

"Project at this place temporarily held pending disposition of a bill permitting the use of the present site in conjunction with property already purchased.

"SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

"Limit of cost for project is insufficient to permit of the purchase of a site favored by Treasury and Post Office Departments. An increase of $70,000 in the limit of cost would permit the acquisition of this first choice.

"CINCINNATI, OHIO

"Limit of cost of $1,000,000 for a site is not sufficient to acquire a site in the immediate business area. Unless this amount is increased, it will be necessary to purchase a site on the edge of business and maintain a small postal station in the business section.

"WACO, TEX.

"Present legislation authorizes acquisition of a new site under a limit of cost of $150,000. Post Office Department considers the present site a better location for its activities than any of the new sites offered. In order to acquire sufficient land to make the present site suitable in area it is necessary that present legislation be amended.

"POTTSVILLE, PA.

"Legislation contemplates the acquisition of a new site and the construction of a new building under a limit of cost of $325,000. The shape and topography of the sites offered has caused the Post Office Department to recommend the acquisition of additional land, demolition of the present building, and a new building on the present site extended under a limit of cost of $315,000. Until amended legislation is obtained, no action can be taken toward carrying out the scheme approved by the Post Office Department.

"SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

"Limit of cost for additional land and extension $1,315,000. The driveway at the rear of the present building is 26 feet wide on one street and 48 feet on the other. Additional land permitting the widening of the driveway can be purchased for $48,000, although originally held for $80,000. Had the present limit of cost been sufficient, this additional property would have been purchased. In order to acquire this land an increase of $48,000 would be necessary.

"There are several other projects which are being temporarily held on account of site complications and no definite statement can be made at this time as to whether or not these cases will ultimately require amended legislation.

"ST. LOUIS, MO.

"Limit of cost $3,825,000. Federal activities have increased their space requirements 48 per cent since the limit of cost was established. To provide this additional space will necessitate an increase in the limit of cost of $1,245,000. In the absence of amended legislation, the department proposes to construct a 6-story building so designed that four additional stories may be added at some future date."

The CHAIRMAN. Take the situation at St. Louis, for instance. I understood you to say that it was first contemplated to put up a 6-story building and ultimately to add four more. Is it the purpose now, and is that what is causing the delay, to arrange for the erection of the whole 10 stories?

Mr. MARTIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it that is causing the delay?

Mr. MARTIN. The delay up to this time was caused by the courts demanding top-floor or top-building space.

Mr. WETMORE. To get away from the noise.

Mr. MARTIN. Obviously in a 6-story building they would have to be pretty close to the ground, probably on the third, fourth, and fifth floors. The courts were loath to approve a plan of a smaller building, because they were looking forward eventually to a 10-story building and they did not want to be tied down to the third, fourth, and fifth floors when they wanted, say, the seventh, eighth, and ninth floors. But finally, in order to get the job started, a number of conferences were held with the judges and the Department of Justice and the architect and the Treasury officials and we finally reached an agreement as to space assignments and we will have the foundations on the market within a short time. The foundations will be so designed that we can add additional stories at some later date and the design of itself will be such that architecturally it will be a proper building when the final four stories are added.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is not the intention to hold that up altogether?

Mr. MARTIN. It is not the intention to hold up on that building or on any building where we can go as far as possible under the authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. That applies to St. Paul, also?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any idea when you will start that building in St. Louis or be in a position to start it?

Mr. MARTIN. I think the foundation plans are getting very close to the market now, are they not, Judge Wetmore?

Mr. WETMORE. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. And the same thing is true of St. Paul.

The CHAIRMAN. After your foundation plans are ready, what will be necessary?

Mr. MARTIN. Then you will put the superstructure job on the market for the 6-story building, the smaller building, within the limit of cost.

Mr. WOOD. How soon after the foundation is in?

Mr. MARTIN. The superstructure job ought to be on the market a couple of months before the foundations are completed in order that the construction may be continuous.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us about when you think the foundation will be completed?

Mr. MARTIN. The present indications are that the foundations should be completed about October 1, 1932.

Mr. ARNOLD. How long do you think it will be before these other four stories will be necessary?

Mr. MARTIN. They are necessary right now.

Mr. ARNOLD. What would be the additional cost if you completed your six stories, then stopped, and then at a later date added four stories, over what it would be if you went right ahead and built your 10-story building in one operation?

Mr. MARTIN. I would say that if the judges are agreeable to stay on the third, fourth, and fifth floors, the estimated additional cost would be in the neighborhood of $100,000 by doing it in two bites.

The CHAIRMAN. That is over and above the actual cost?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir. The judges demand being on the top floor when the other four stories are completed, the cost of remodeling the judges' quarters down below, in addition to the roof changes, and what not, will run a considerable sum above that.

The CHAIRMAN. It would seem to me, inasmuch as these 19 buildings have already been authorized by Congress and already acted upon, they are in a rather different category than new buildings.

Mr. MARTIN. There is no question about that.

Mr. WOOD. Why would it not be more economical to wait a little while and get an authorization to erect your 10 stories at one time? If, as you say, they need the space now, it is only a question of a very short time until you will have to put up the additional four stories, and it seems to me that would be a very uneconomical way of doing it.

Mr. THATCHER. You ought to do one of two things, either defer building this structure altogether until you are ready to go ahead with all of it, or else erect all of it at this time.

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. If this is erected now as a 10-story building, what will be the value of the release from other property?

Mr. MARTIN. The post office and courthouse in St. Louis, which it is proposed to vacate, is estimated to be worth in the neighborhood of four to four and a half million dollars, and that building would either be vacated and the activities that could not be placed in the smaller new building would have to rent quarters, or you would have to retain the present post office and courthouse.

Mr. THATCHER. Would there be any market for that old site now?

Mr. MARTIN. You see, in any event, we are thinking about the market about two years from now.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Of course, you are going to use the building up to that time.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What is the cost of the St. Louis building as it is proposed to complete it in 10 stories?

Mr. MARTIN. The total limit of cost for site and building is $3,825,000. We have approximately $2,700,000 available for construction.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Could you build it within that estimate?

Mr. MARTIN. We can build a 6-story building within the $2,700,000.

Mr. ABERNETHY. How much would it cost you to build the 10-story building?

Mr. MARTIN. It is estimated that it would cost $1,245,000 more.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I can not see why you should not go along and finish it at this time.

Mr. THATCHER. The six stories will be inadequate to house all the Federal activities?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir; by some 100,000 square feet.

Mr. THATCHER. Representing a rental of about how much?

Mr. MARTIN. That would be hard to state, Mr. Congressman. At a dollar a foot it would be $100,000.

Mr. THATCHER. Annually?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THATCHER. If you erected your 10-story building, then you could house all the Federal activities.

Mr. MARTIN. All the Federal activities requiring space at this location and dispose of the old building.

Mr. THATCHER. About how much would it cost to do that; $1,500,000 more, you say?

Mr. MARTIN. $1,245,000 is the estimate.

Mr. WOOD. What stands in the way of erecting your 10-story building?

Mr. THATCHER. A Budget estimate.

Mr. WOOD. But if you get an authorization, that will remove the obstacle and I should think it would be worth while to get that and save the amount of money that you have indicated it would cost to do it as it is now proposed.

Mr. ABERNETHY. These 19 projects you are now discussing would come in under the sixth installment. What is the total amount of those 19 projects?

Mr. MARTIN. The increases in limits of cost of all of the 19 will be less than $5,000,000 and a number of them would not involve any increase in limit of cost.

Mr. ARNOLD. I should think the thing to do would be to hold up the contract on this general construction of these projects until the sixth installment comes along and do now what you know you will have to do eventually at a very much increased cost.

Is it not true that building costs are at a minimum now?

Mr. WETMORE. Yes; the costs are as low as they have been at any time since the war, I think.

Mr. MARTIN. We have contractors coming in and asking us to please take early action on the awarding of contracts because they want to hold their subcontractors to present prices. Several contractors have brought that to my attention.

Mr. ARNOLD. Inasmuch as this space is absolutely needed it would seem to me the proper thing to do would be to go ahead and do the whole job at this time.

Mr. MARTIN. We think so; yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. If that is all there is standing in the way, an authorization for an additional appropriation, it strikes me, from all the facts you have given us, it would be the part of folly to put up a 6-story building and then wait until you get an authorization for another building, repair the roof or change the roof and then put on your additional face. It seems to me that would be a foolish piece of business.

STATEMENT OF ST. LOUIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The St. Louis Chamber of Commerce is publicly on record for governmental economy. It will maintain that position by refusing to be a party to any attempt to increase Federal appropriations or expenditures for any project, unless definite economies can be shown as the result of the proposed outlay of Federal funds.

In line with this general policy, we believe, here is a case of "false economy" in which to "pinch" is to pay greater in some other more concealed fashion, a case where it's just as good business to spend in order to save, where such expenditure can be almost covered through the sale of assets already owned by the United States Government in this city, and not a large out-of-Treasury expense, a case where spending now will save considerable money because of present low building costs.

These chief reasons justify and compel the submission of this statement.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

There is now before the Bureau of the Budget the question of an additional authorization for a Federal office building in St. Louis. No money is asked nor will be needed until 1934 or 1935.

Two plans have been advanced.

The first is for a 5-story building. An appropriation of $3,825,000 has been made to buy the ground and erect a building in which to house the offices, departments, agencies, and bureaus now quartered in the present Federal building and the old customhouse. The value of the ground has been fixed at $1,060,000; the preliminary expenses for plans, deeds, etc., have been estimated at $190,000, leaving approximately $2,575,000 for the cost of a building, with 181,500 square feet of floor space.

The second is for a 10-story building. An additional authorization of $1,250,000 is needed for the erection of a larger building adequate to house not only the bureaus, agencies, and departments located in the present two old buildings, but also a number of other Federal agencies now quartered elsewhere and for which the Government is paying a large annual rental. This plan also contemplates sufficient space for the expansion of existing agencies, as well as for new departments as they may be hereafter created.

Because of the present condition of the Federal Budget, there is some apprehension that the smaller-building idea might prevail. Therefore a thorough study has been made of all the factors involved.

We are submitting certain facts pertinent to the case and contending for the additional authorization primarily for reasons of economy.

ECONOMIC REASONS

The United States Government now owns three pieces of property in St. Louis which are an important factor in the present discussion of a new Federal building, i. e., (1) the old Federal building, Eighth and Olive Streets; (2) the old customs building, Third and Olive Streets; (3) a lot on the southeast corner of Fourth and Chestnut Streets.

The old Federal building at Eighth and Olive Streets was erected by the Treasury Department in 1874—58 years ago. Even though construction and land valuation at that time were low, the total cost was $5,686,854.68, of which $368,882.65 was paid for the site. Its total floor area totals 163,891 square feet.

In it at the present time are housed: Central post-office station, district court and clerk, court of appeals and clerk, district attorney and Department of Justice, marshal, grand jury, commissioner, customs collector, internal-revenue office, secret-service agents, Naturalization Bureau, Immigration Bureau, narcotic agents, prohibition agents, Engineer Corps, Bureau of Animal Industry, and veterans' employment bureau.

Three qualified appraisers have placed a sale value of $4,849,560 on this building.

The old Customs Building, located at Third and Olive Streets, has 51,893 square feet of floor area, and in it are now housed: Customs appraiser, food and drug administrators, locomotive inspection, Veterans' Bureau examiner, Civil Service Commission, Navy, Marine, and Coast Guard recruiting, Lighthouse Service and Steamboat Inspection, special prohibition agents, One hundred and second division of the Organized Army Reserve, fruit and vegetable inspectors, Market News Service, and the Interstate Commerce Commission's valuation service.

The sale valuation placed on this property by the appraisers is $48,195.

The lot at Fourth and Chestnut was purchased by the Government on June 27, 1911, as a site for a new Federal building, following the complaints of officials, merchants, and manufacturers that the then existing quarters were inadequate because departments and agencies were increasing and the then existing ones expanding. At that time Congress appropriated $1,600,000 to erect a building on this site, but it was never built.

The sale value of this property, according to the appraisers, is $180,808.80.

Thus the sale values of these three Federal Government-owned pieces of property totals $5,078,563, while the floor space of the two existing buildings totals 215,784 square feet.

Then came the World War in 1917, which probably doubled the number of agencies, materially increased the number of officials and assistants, as well as the volume of work to be done. A study of the situation following the war showed that the ground area at Fourth and Chestnut was inadequate, and the appropriation too small for the erecting of a building large enough to accommodate the then existing Federal agencies and bureaus, so the Treasury Department selected a new site at the southeast corner of Twelfth Boulevard and Market Street.

An investigation made by the Federal Business Association of St. Louis, an organization composed of the heads of departments, bureaus, and agencies of the United States Government stationed in St. Louis, revealed that a sizable number of Federal agencies in this city were not headquartered in the old Federal building or the old customhouse, and that provisions for these activities were not included in the plans for the proposed new structure on Twelfth Boulevard and Market Street.

Furthermore, it was found that the rental for the space occupied by them amounts to a considerable annual outlay of Federal money. A list of these agencies, their location, floor space occupied, and annual rental follows:

Agency	Location	Square feet	Annual rent
Veterans' Bureau	4030 Chouteau Avenue	19,280	$26,028
Engineer Corps	Victoria Building	11,589	17,383
Prohibition laboratory	1126 Title Guaranty	2,367	4,303
Bureau of Investigation	Title Guaranty Building	1,900	3,814
Weather Bureau	Railway Exchange Building	1,858	3,600
Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.	Mississippi Valley Transportation.	1,652	3,180
National-bank examiners	Federal Commerce Transportation Building.	1,500	3,060
Federal grain supervision	Merchants Exchange	2,600	2,907
Bureau of accounts, Interstate Commerce Commission.	1721 Railway Exchange Building.	1,000	2,160
Ordnance Office	Telephone Building	240	720
Total		43,986	67,160

The Government, therefore, in addition to maintaining the old Federal building and old customhouse, pays $67,160 annually in rentals for an additional 43,986 square feet of space.

Thus the total floor space the Government now has in St. Louis for the agencies so far mentioned is 259,870 square feet (including the old Federal building space, customhouse, and that which is now rented).

SUMMARY

1. The 5-story plan for the new Federal building, if carried through, would provide only 181,500 square feet of floor space.

But the present floor space in the two existing old buildings is 215,784 square feet, to which must be added, to determine the space now in use, the 43,986 square feet rented by the Government, or a total of 259,870 square feet.

Manifestly, therefore, the floor space contemplated in the 5-story plan is wholly inadequate, not only to house existing Federal agencies, but also to provide for their future expansion and to house any new departments, bureaus, or agencies which may be created in the future.

2. Present rent ($67,160) for space occupied outside of the two existing buildings is large enough of itself, but if carried over a period of years the amount becomes a serious consideration. Furthermore, unless adequate space is provided, any new agencies created, or any expansion of existing departments will swell the rental bill. This could be saved by the erection of the larger building. In these hectic days a dollar saved is a dollar earned.

3. The real estate now owned by the United States Government—the old Federal building, the old customhouse, and the lot at Fourth and Chestnut Streets—when sold will almost equal the cost of erecting the new 10-story office building. So the Government would in reality be paying a comparatively small extra sum for doing the job right.

4. Present building costs are low, perhaps lower than they will again be for years to come. It would be economy to build the large building now rather than wait until later and be penalized with higher costs.

It is therefore obviously good business to build the 10-story building rather than the smaller one for reasons of economy, and in order to provide an edifice where all present Government offices can be housed and new agencies and the expansion of present ones can be properly cared for.

VALUE OF CENTRALIZATION

Central headquarters are a public convenience. When important activities move from place to place every few years, as renters are bound to do, confusion results and irritation develops. Local business constantly utilizes the facilities of Federal agencies. Only loss of time and money follows when one has to move from office to office, located widely apart, to transact business.

But with all offices established in one building, that fact soon becomes fixed in the public mind, stimulates increased use of their services, and establishes a beaten path between business houses and Government offices.

ST. LOUIS, PAST AND PRESENT

Fifty-eight years ago, when the old Federal building at Eighth and Olive was erected, the population of St. Louis was 310,864. There was practically no suburban population.

The picture to-day is quite different. In 1930 the population, as given by the United States Census Bureau, was 821,960, with a suburban population of 211,593, while the metropolitan area—which didn't exist in 1874—contains 1,293,516 people within its confines.

The Federal operating bureaus in 1874 were fewer and their duties relatively less, because the volume of business was not to-day's equivalent by hundreds of millions of dollars annually. There was, therefore, proportionately a lesser need for Government service and supervision.

Business in this district has increased even at a larger rate than the population, because the area has become one of the industrial centers of the country. St. Louis, city and suburban, will continue to grow, and with it the need for the expansion of existing Federal agencies and the location of the headquarters of new ones as created.

ADDITIONAL REASONS FOR A 10-STORY BUILDING

The site:

St. Louis voted an $87,000,000 bond issue for public improvements. One item in the issue provides for a memorial plaza, with plans for a group of buildings which, from the standpoint of architectural beauty, will be symbolic of the progress and greatness of the city.

All of these structures have been, or will be, erected from public funds raised through taxation. Millions of dollars have been and additional millions will be invested in them. Here will be transacted the business of the municipality.

The site of the proposed Federal office building, at Twelfth Boulevard and Market Street, was selected so that when completed the structure will front on this memorial plaza. Twelfth Boulevard and Market Street is the junction of two of the most traveled boulevards under a system of improved boulevards and streets prepared by the City Plan Commission.

The ends of Twelfth Boulevard, running north and south, verge to the southwest and the northwest. The central and south divisions of this widened thoroughfare have been completed, while the northern has been condemned, and the work of widening is now in process.

Market Street is being similarly widened, and commissioners have assessed the damages and benefits for the necessary right of way for widening, and by the time the Federal building is completed this street likewise will be finished. This boulevard will connect with the proposed improved Mississippi River waterfront and will join the boulevards and parkways extending along the river with the commercial and financial districts in the heart of the city and the residential sections.

Like the northern and southern extensions of Twelfth Boulevard, Market Street will connect with the State and Federal highway leading to the West, the Northwest, and the Southwest, as well as to the North and South. It likewise has direct connection with the bridges across the Mississippi River, and thereby connects directly with the Federal highways converging at St. Louis from all sections east of the river.

As a matter of fact, the Memorial Plaza, on which the proposed Federal building will be located, is the focal point of extensive city planning, on which St. Louis has already spent millions of dollars, and the work is only well in hand. A building which houses the offices of the United States Government should harmonize in monumental importance with the plans of the municipality.

CHARACTER OF BUILDINGS ON PLAZA

The type of buildings, public and private, erected on the Memorial Plaza, or immediately adjacent thereto, is a factor which should not be overlooked.

North of the new Federal building, across Market Street, is the new Civil Courts Building, which, when finally completed, will cost about $5,000,000. The City Hall, immediately west, across Twelfth Boulevard, was finished years ago, before the period of high construction costs, at $2,000,000. On the north side of the plaza is the Public Library, erected 20 years ago, for $1,500,000. On the south side of the plaza is the Municipal Courts Building, costing $2,083,000 for ground and building. A block south of the plaza on Twelfth Boulevard is the Police Administration Building and Gymnasium, costing $2,165,519. Northeast of the Civil Courts Building is the $6,000,000 Telephone Office Building, and across the street from the Public Library and facing the plaza is the $4,000,000 Missouri Pacific Building.

The Government of the United States, with an outstanding location in such a group, should not erect a building inferior in size, design, or needs to those erected by the city. If for no other reason, although there are others, national officials should not invite invidious comparisons that will follow failure to erect an edifice commensurate to its purpose and surroundings.

But that viewpoint is based on a consciousness that the dignity of the Federal Government, when erecting a building where its various officials in charge of local and district affairs will be housed, shall not permit its quarters to appear secondary to those of a municipal corporation.

CONCLUSION

The St. Louis Chamber of Commerce urges approval of an additional authorization now, large enough to enable the erection of a new 10-story Federal office building in St. Louis.

(1) Because it will save the Government $67,160 annually in rentals, plus the cost of maintaining the present two old buildings, to say nothing of increased rentals which may become necessary due to enlargement of present activities or the creation of new departments.

(2) Because it will adequately house all existing Federal agencies, bureaus, and departments in St. Louis, and take care of their future expansion and that of any new agencies created.

(3) Because the property now owned by the United States Government can be sold for an amount almost equal to the cost of erecting the new 10-story building.

(4) Because now is the time to build right as building costs are low.

(5) Because of the convenience of centralized location for business users of governmental facilities.

(6) Because the United States Government certainly should erect a structure in harmony with other buildings surrounding it, both in size and architectural beauty, so that invidious comparisons can not follow, and in order that its quarters may not be secondary to those of municipal corporations.

Respectfully submitted.

ST. LOUIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
C. W. GAYLORD,
Chairman of the Board.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., February 23, 1932.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to make a defense for Mr. Mellon nor to make any attack upon him. I have never seen the old gentleman but a few times in my life. The other gentleman who was mentioned this afternoon, Mr. Wetmore, the Supervising Architect, and for whom my friend, who happens to be a thirty-second degree brother, made an honorable defense, I happen to know myself. I was glad he did make that defense for him, because I happen to have that honor, the thirty-second degree, myself, and if he had not done it I would.

It has been my pleasure a few times to have visited Mr. Wetmore, the Supervising Architect, with reference to business connected with his office. I want to say for him, whether he is an architect or not, he has more knowledge of the architectural work going on by this Government in the United States than any man in it. There is not a job that you can inquire about but what this Supervising Architect is perfectly familiar with it and can give you any information you desire with reference to it.

I had the privilege of conferring with him not more than a week ago with reference to a matter, and I soon found out that he knew more about what I was inquiring about than I did, and it was in my own locality. I think he is the right man in the right place.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not what I wanted this five minutes for. My good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], has had his grievance against Mr. Mellon, and presumably the attack that he made this afternoon on the article of aluminum was leveled against Mr. Mellon. It happens that the great bauxite mines of America, next to the largest one in the world, I presume, are located in my district, in the county adjoining the county where I have lived all of my life. I have lived within 25 miles of those mines for my entire life. Aluminum is made from that article, and, as some gentleman said this evening, you will find that ware now in every 10-cent store in America. What I want to say is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] ought not to reflect against a great ware of that kind when it is used in the construction of buildings and mined in Arkansas. I want some aluminum used in Federal buildings, because it is produced down in Hot Springs County, Ark. [Laughter and applause.] It is the finest polished metal to be had. It is as cheap as anything to be had. It is cheaper than brass or some of those things that they want to use as a substitute. Somebody might have a prejudice against it, but not justly so. The bauxite mines in my district employ from 1,000 to 1,500 men all the time.

On this lead of bauxite there has recently been discovered, within 6 miles of where I live, some tripoli mines that will be developed soon, that enter into the making of Dutch Cleanser polish and other polishes for ware and which also enters into automobile tires and such things as that. That is right in connection with it, and it all is found right down in Hot Springs County, Ark., where I live. [Applause.] I am proud of it.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. You have a diamond mine down there too?

Mr. GLOVER. We have a diamond mine there, too, the only one in the world. Arkansas is no longer called the "hoozier" State, but is called the "diamond" State. You can go down there and get your diamonds. You can go down there and get your baths. The truth of the matter is that down there you can get almost anything you want, if you want something dry. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the gravamen of the complaint of the gentleman from Texas is that, in certain specifications of the Treasury Department for public buildings, aluminum in some form or other is required in the material furnished, either in the frames or in the furnishings. I listened attentively to the address of the gentleman, and noted the interpolation of the gentleman from New York as to the use of aluminum in the Empire State Building. The membership would have been led to believe that aluminum was not in use in the construction of large buildings, but that the Treasury Department was attempting to force aluminum as a material in the construction.

If the gentleman from Texas had been fortunate in his peregrinations about the country in advocacy of the bonus to have had the time, as for example, on his visit to my home city in Milwaukee during the Christmas holidays, to have gone to the plant of the A. O. Smith Co., which Arthur Brisbane describes, in the method of producing pipes and chassis for automobiles, to be the ninth wonder of the world, he would have seen there a most modern office building, erected by the A. O. Smith Co., 12 stories of construction, entirely faced with aluminum. That was finished more than two years ago.

It has been stated to the gentleman that the Empire State Building, constructed under the direction of that great leader of Democracy, Alfred E. Smith, also has aluminum prescribed as its finishings. Does the gentleman contend that the Treasury Department should hold back in the pace of progress and refuse to recognize the value of aluminum with its intrinsic merits as a necessary building material?

Why not be fair? Why does he not call the attention of the country to the fact that aluminum is now being generally accepted as the finest type of material in office construction? The gentleman is only telling a half truth, and a very small half truth at that, when he reads from the architects' magazine which is limited entirely to public buildings. Why did not the gentleman go further and investigate architects' publications as to private buildings? If he had done that he would have found, I dare say, numerous instances where aluminum is to-day the accepted article for outside finish?

I think the gentleman owes an apology to this House for only giving half truths in trying to show that Mr. Mellon used the high privileges of his office, through the Supervising Architect, in prescribing aluminum as a necessary material for public-building construction?

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. PATMAN. In prescribing aluminum, does not the gentleman think the Secretary of the Treasury should also give wood and steel a chance?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not living in the age of 100 or 200 years ago. We must move forward; and I know this much about fixtures, that when the building in which I have my office was remodeled it was provided, so as to keep out dust, that aluminum weather strips be used. I know that much. I am very sorry indeed the gentleman did not have time to visit our breweries on his visit to Milwaukee so that he might have gotten some liberal ideas, and also that the gentleman did not have time to visit the A. O. Smith plant in order to get modern ideas as to modern construction. We are all modern in Milwaukee.

I hope the gentleman, who has so often said he reflects the ideas of the war veterans, will go to the desk and sign the petition for the discharge of the Judiciary Committee in the matter of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, because then he will surely be carrying out the will and wishes of the war veterans of the World War. [Applause.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma motion I made to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his pro forma motion to strike out the paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERNANDEZ: On page 35, after line 10, insert:

"New Orleans, La., post office and courthouse: For acoustical treatment in the court room, $2,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment I have offered simply provides that $2,000 be made available for acoustical treatment in the Federal court room in the city of New Orleans. Unless this amendment prevails the judges and counsel will be forced to continue the practice of shouting above the whine of traffic that passes on Camp Street. There are three Federal court rooms on the second floor of the post office building. The central room is used by United States Judge Wayne G. Borah, and the court room on the Magazine Street side is used by the Fifth United States Circuit Court of Appeals. The third room, on the Camp Street side, is used only in emergencies on account of the lack of acoustical treatment.

It is impossible, gentlemen of the committee, for counsel or witnesses to hear what is going on in the court room under the conditions which prevail there to-day. I submit to the committee that is not decorum and is not in keeping with the dignity of a United States court.

Let me call the attention of the committee to page 625 of the hearing:

ACOUSTICAL TREATMENT, NEW ORLEANS (LA.) COURTHOUSE

The CHAIRMAN. There is an item here in reference to the New Orleans post office and courthouse, for acoustical treatment in the court room, $2,000. Tell us about that.

Mr. WETMORE. I want to say, in the first place, that our maintenance appropriation "for repairs and preservation" are not permitted by the comptroller to be used for acoustical treatment in public buildings. The appropriation is in terms for repairs and preservation, and we would have money enough to do this work out of our annual appropriation, if the comptroller would allow us. But he holds, and I suppose properly, that this character of expenditure is neither a repair nor a preservation. It is in the nature of an improvement, and he draws the line on us there.

The district engineer, Mr. Richly, stated:

"This room has been but little used on account of this trouble (that is, the acoustical defects), but since two additional judges have been appointed it will be necessary to use all the court rooms. I have conferred with several of the judges and recommended that consideration be given to the correction of the acoustics as requested, and which are very bad."

Further, in the hearings there is a letter from Judge Bryan addressed to the custodian of the building, complaining about the same situation.

The committee to-day cut out about three positions down in New Orleans, amounting to thousands of dollars, and I think at least the committee can be charitable enough to give New Orleans this $2,000 so as to repair the acoustics of this court room, which, as I have said, is something that is badly needed.

Certainly, it is not in keeping with the dignity of a Federal court to have witnesses crowding around the attorneys' tables and around the judge's stand to hear what is going on.

I hope the committee will restore this item to the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I would like very much indeed to agree to the gentleman's amendment. The gentleman has made a very earnest effort to have it included in the bill and it was a part of the Budget estimate. The reason it is omitted from the bill is because the committee felt it is one of those expenditures that can easily be deferred for another year. We eliminated many expenditures on this ground.

For years they have not had this improvement down there in New Orleans, and they have been getting along pretty well, and it seems to me on account of the present situation of the Treasury, we might well defer it for one more year at least.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. I might call the gentleman's attention to the fact that they have not been using this particular court room that they have to use now. The fact they recently appointed two additional judges down there has made it necessary that they should use this additional court room. It is a small matter and I sincerely hope the committee will agree to the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. It is a small sum, but I will say to the gentleman that consistent with the policy of the committee with reference to other appropriations, this being in our opinion not an absolutely essential appropriation, we eliminated it, and I think in order to be fair the committee must insist that the amendment ought to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERNANDEZ) there were—ayes 4, noes 14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the authorization of funds for public buildings there was authorized an appropriation of $580,000,000 as a total, out of which the District of Columbia was allotted $150,000,000.

I want to show you what is happening. The department committee went ahead and made its allocation with respect to the smaller towns, but the Bureau of the Budget has refused to pass it up to Congress, and the thing which I predicted would happen when the large cities and the District of Columbia received their money to build their buildings, the smaller cities would be left out. I stated at that time that the small towns throughout the United States would be shut out, and that is what has happened already.

The District of Columbia was to get $150,000,000 and $40,000,000 more for land, or $190,000,000 out of a total of $580,000,000. The District of Columbia has already received over $100,000,000, and to the credit of the Committee on Appropriations it may be said that they cut them down to $15,000,000 in this bill; but the Bureau of the Budget was willing to give more money for the District of Columbia and yet refused appropriations for the buildings that will take them now 6 or 7 or 8 years to finish, and they are the buildings that are needed in the smaller cities all over the United States.

As soon as they get the buildings in the District of Columbia and in the large cities of the country, then the smaller cities of the country can go. They are through with them.

This is not the fault of the Treasury Department nor the Post Office Department, but it is the fault of the Bureau of the Budget. After having granted $100,000,000 to the District of Columbia and $40,000,000 to buy land in the District of Columbia, they then refused to ask Congress to appropriate the money for buildings in the small cities, amounting to something like $154,000,000.

I am here to protest and to serve notice on the Bureau of the Budget and the committee, that if they expect large appropriations to the District of Columbia they are going to go through with the allocations made to the small cities, or we will see the reason why.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read to the bottom of page 35.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOWARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9699, the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE CONGRESS OF NICARAGUA

ENFORCEMENT OF CRIMINAL LAW—BANKRUPTCY (H. DOC. NO. 262)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered printed.

(For text of message of the President see Senate proceedings, p. 4920.)

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. GILLEN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for six days, on account of important business.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech by my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM E. HULL, before the American Legion Post, No. 2, Peoria, Ill., on February 18, 1932.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM E. HULL, OF ILLINOIS

Honorable Commander and members of Peoria Post, No. 2: It was with a special pleasure that I received your kind invitation to be your guest to-night and to speak to you briefly upon matters of national importance.

Recently I have received numerous letters from the American Legion posts throughout the district and the Nation urging me to stand for a liberal policy toward national defense, and I want to say to-night that I stand before you, as I have always stood, a firm believer of the principle of maintaining defense adequate to assure the peace and tranquillity of our Nation.

Great strides are being made in scientific achievements toward perfection of instruments of destruction to be used in war, and no nation can sit calmly by and ignore the preparations made by the scientists of other Nations and not take some step toward meeting them.

The time has not yet come, in my opinion, when the lion and lamb can lie down in safety together. Nations are still jealous of each other; and while this condition exists the United States should have at least a nucleus of an Army, trained to the last minute in all modern methods of warfare, and our young men should have an opportunity to at least have some slight vision of the training that is necessary for them to have in order to protect themselves if called upon to defend their country.

We should have a navy efficient and capable to at least match the navy of any other country in the world. That is the only sure way that I know of to enable us to keep our peace and integrity among the nations.

Our country was born in battle. When the Colonies, in 1775, rebelled against the mother country, it was in defense of the principle taxation without representation was tyranny, and they simply were fighting for equal rights as citizens of England; but, as the struggle continued, the great colonial leaders had a vision. It came to them that this was the day that men had looked forward to for thousands of years, and they came to the decision that they would at once and for all strike for the great principle that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and when George Washington received the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, a new nation was born, and for the first time in the world's history there was a flag under whose folds was guaranteed to its citizens equal rights and equal justice.

George Washington, the great Commander in Chief of the victorious Continental Armies, became our first President, and under his matchless wisdom the United States took its place among the nations of the world and hoped for years of peace and tranquillity but it was not long before it became necessary to declare war against England in order to protect the rights of our American seamen, who were being impressed into service on British ships.

This War of 1812 gave birth to the American Navy and was practically won upon the high seas in a naval campaign that challenged the admiration of the world, the war being brought to a sudden close by the spectacular victory of Andrew Jackson and his straight-shooting mountaineers at the Battle of New Orleans.

In 1846 it became necessary to declare war upon Mexico in order to protect our southwestern boundary and settle the boundary dispute between the two countries, and as a result of the victory of Zachary Taylor at Buena Vista the boundary line between the two countries was definitely settled for all time to come.

In 1861, the great crisis of American history appeared. After many years of heated controversy and debate, the time had come to settle forever whether a government such as ours could maintain its integrity, half free and half slave.

In this great crisis, God gave us Lincoln.

Four years of frightful struggle ensued and when General Grant received the sword of Lee at Appomattox, it was determined beyond a peradventure of a doubt that this country of the people, by the people, for the people, should not perish from the earth.

In 1898, it became necessary to declare war against the Kingdom of Spain, not only to maintain our national integrity, but in order to rescue the citizens of our next-door neighbor, Cuba, who were being ground into the dust under the tyranny of the iron heel of Spain. When Teddy Roosevelt planted the Stars and Stripes on the San Juan Hill and the smoke of battle had cleared from the decks of Dewey's fleets in Manila Bay, freedom took another breath of life, and tyranny, such as was practiced in the islands of Cuba and the Philippines, disappeared from the face of the earth.

Then came the World War, and I bow my head with reverence and respect before you men who, by your heroic deeds, wrote so clearly the final chapters of that great conflict. No one can ever know, as well as you, the sacrifices that were made, the hardships that were endured in order to bring peace once more to a war-torn world. A greater man than I has told you that when you laid aside your steel-clad helmet, that when you hung up your khaki uniform, you had only performed a part of the responsibilities that were yours to perform. An even greater task lay before you in solving the problems of peace and making the adjustments that were necessary to bring about harmony out of the chaos caused by this great war. These problems confront you on every hand to-day, more serious in some respects than war; and in the solution of these problems, it is my hope that you will be guided by the wisdom of Washington, by the great human kindness of Lincoln, and by the conciliatory methods of the martyred President, McKinley. The drive recently started by the American Legion posts throughout the country to find jobs for a million of the unemployed is a worthy step in this direction; I bid you Godspeed in this good work and stand ready at all times to assist you in all your undertakings.

You are all more or less familiar with my activities in Congress in behalf of the veterans of our different wars and especially in behalf of the veterans of the World War, because all the legislation in their behalf took things up at the beginning and consequently had to be original, and many of the plans had to be worked out to meet new conditions. I gave eagerly and willingly all my best thought to the preparation of this legislation and have supported every practical effort that has been made to compensate and reimburse the soldiers of the World War as far as it is humanly and practically possible.

The legislation that was passed could not represent the opinion of any individual but had to reflect the composite thought of the entire Congress.

I was one of those who thought in the beginning that if we were going to pay the veterans an adjusted compensation, we ought to pay it in cash. I have never thought that it was common sense to postpone the payment of this compensation for 20 years because we all knew by that time pension legislation would be enacted to take care of those who were disabled, afflicted, and needed help. I felt that this act of Congress should provide for giving the boys a start after they came back from the war and in some measure to equalize their position with those who were not called to the colors. For this reason I will be glad to see the balance paid on these compensation certificates just as soon as some financial arrangement can be made to take care of them.

I realize that arrangements must be made in the near future, if it is not possible to do it at this time, to take care of the widows and orphans of the veterans of the World War as has been done in regard to the veterans of our other wars.

Economic conditions at the present moment are in a sort of chaotic condition, and these conditions must be taken into consideration. However, I think we should meet this matter in a courageous manner and as soon as it is possible make arrangements to fulfill in a full measure our obligations to these veterans.

During the time that I have served as your Representative in Congress, I have in a careful and painstaking and sympathetic manner handled individual cases for the veterans of the sixteenth district amounting now into the thousands.

The adjustments of these compensation claims are fixed by law; there is no way whereby a Member of Congress can wave a magic wand and cause a compensation claim to be allowed out of hand, but it is possible for a Member of Congress, if he so desires, to render valuable assistance to the soldiers and their dependents by finding out what is necessary in order to perfect a claim and then painstakingly help the soldier to secure the necessary evidence and see that it receives the proper consideration by the bureau official. This, I have tried to do and I take advantage of this opportunity to gratefully acknowledge the assistance that has come to me in this connection from the American Legion posts, not only here in Peoria but throughout the district. No soldier boy or his dependents need ever to hesitate or apologize for writing me in behalf of any matter with which they are concerned, because their communication will find a welcome at my office and it will receive the best attention that it is possible to give it.

I have been given the honor of presenting to you a bust of George Washington, sponsored by the George Washington Bicentennial Commission to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of this great American, whose great achievements time has not dimmed but have come down through the ages, gathering additional luster through the years. George Washington—the great general but a kind husband, a great statesman but a humble citizen, a man of great achievements but a kind and faithful neighbor! It is exceedingly fitting that his bust should find a place in the lodge room of your post—he was the first American Legionnaire.

THE OIL SITUATION IN OHIO

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the oil situation in Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I think most Democrats are getting tired of our tariff position being misrepresented. I noted in the Washington Post for Saturday, February 27, this concluding paragraph in an editorial:

> Democrats in the oil-producing States plead with no less vociferation for a duty on petroleum. The "iniquities of the tariff" soon melt away when it is applied to industries of Democratic States. In the face of these organized drives to tax two imports that are now admitted free the howl of the central Democratic organization against the Smoot-Hawley Act sounds like a wind blowing through an empty barrel.

Here is the official statement of our party as set forth in the platform of 1928:

> The Democratic tariff legislation will be based on the following policies:
> (a) The maintenance of legitimate business and a high standard of wages for American labor.
> (b) Increasing the purchasing power of wages and income by the reduction of those monopolistic and extortionate tariff rates bestowed in payment of political debts.
> (c) Abolition of logrolling and restoration of the Democratic conception of a fact-finding tariff commission, quasi-judicial and free from the Executive domination which has destroyed the usefulness of the present commission.
> (d) Duties that will permit effective competition, insure against monopoly, and at the same time produce a fair revenue for the support of government. Actual difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of the American laborer, must be the extreme measure of every tariff rate.
> (e) Safeguarding the public against monopoly created by special tariff favors
> (f) Equitable distribution of the benefits and burdens of the tariff among all.

When the whole Nation is interested in our attempts to restore prosperity there can be little justification for the utterly false charges being continuously leveled against Democratic Members of Congress who are loyally following the principles officially enunciated by our national convention.

It might be interesting to know just why the paper making this attack has been so ardently misrepresenting the Democratic Party and the American petroleum industry. Why should it oppose this tariff only? What sinister or at least concealed motives lie behind its desperate efforts to whitewash the monopoly now being developed by the great oil-importing corporations at the expense of American labor and to the ruin of American prosperity?

This question is purely rhetorical. While you and I may guess the cause of the trouble, we do not know it positively and we can have no reasonable expectation that it will be revealed by those most interested.

The manner in which Ohio is being looted to-day for the benefit of the great oil-importing corporations and to the ruin of our industry and to the destitution of our workers, is suggested by the fact that every barrel of Pennsylvania oil produced in the 17 counties in southeastern Ohio is not only given away, but a $2 bill is taken out of the producer's pocket and pinned to every barrel sold. Over the rest of the State in the other three fields—Corning, Lima, and Wooster—the producer not only gives his oil away, but pins a $1 bill to every barrel sold at present prices. These facts are being widely disseminated through my State by the oil companies, who are informing the people concerning the facts underlying the poverty and distress which are the natural result of our free admission of cheap foreign oil produced by cheap foreign labor, while American workers starve.

At present 60 counties in Ohio are oil producing, while the other 28 counties are potential oil fields, according to A. E. Faine, statistician of the Ohio Penn Grade Oil Producers Association, whose carefully compiled statistics I am utilizing in these remarks. The potential territory thus far undeveloped in Ohio will also enter the producing field, with the resulting employment of thousands of men who are now jobless, whenever we give the American petroleum industry an equal chance at our own markets with foreigners whom we are to-day favoring to our ruin. Ohio contains 11 per cent of all the oil wells in the United States. Over one-half of the number of men normally employed in this industry in my State are without employment to-day.

The general discontent naturally produced by this unemployment, which is artificially caused and which could be easily remedied if simple justice were applied to the oil problem, is being capitalized and fomented by those elements which are eager to destroy our political institutions and our economic system. No one need be surprised that men who realize that their poverty has been created and is being continued in order that a few great oil-importing concerns may add a billion dollars or so per year to their profits should question the worth of a system which deliberately continues such a state of affairs.

The State itself is suffering from this situation. Oil production pays a tax rate of 10 per cent throughout the country. Ohio taxes gasoline 110 per cent. The Ohio producer ultimately pays all these taxes by lowered prices for crude oil, which is his product, because of the importation of foreign oil either already admitted or poised as a menace in case the American producer proves refractory.

Oil wells are being abandoned, to the great economic loss of the State. In the past two years 3,179 oil wells have been closed, causing a taxable valuation loss of many millions of dollars per year and a direct tax loss of thousands of dollars, while the loss in wages to employees who formerly operated those wells is a staggering total. Meanwhile, the closing of those wells means the loss forever of millions of barrels of oil, which can never be recovered. Every friend of conservation of our natural resources should note this effect of our unwise and costly policy of admitting foreign oil duty free.

There is no future for the petroleum industry in Ohio, and I see little promise in fact for the industry in other States of the Union if we are to continue the policy of granting such costly favors to a few oil importers or to a comparatively small number of manufacturers who prefer to save a cent or two on fuel oil while they wreck their own potential market in this Nation.

Those who suggest that the American petroleum industry can solve its problem by limiting production can know, if they do not already know, that this industry has involved private agreement, State regulation and even bayonets in order to reduce production well within the limits of demand, only to see the importers of foreign oil increase those imports until they had flooded the market which the American producer had tried to stabilize. This Nation is suffering to-day from overimportation of foreign oil and not from overproduction of American oil. It is suffering from the greed of those who are reckless whether their profits are stained with the tears and the blood of American workers while they continue to employ increasing numbers of peons and alien laborers for the sake of the possible profits.

Judas Iscariot got only 30 pieces of silver for his betrayal; Benedict Arnold got only a major general's rank and pension; but the oil importers are reaping hundreds of millions of dollars per year as the price of wreckage of American prosperity and their favoritism displayed toward foreign lands and foreign flags and foreign labor.

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the latest report of the national employment commission, which shows that the total to date is 117,535 men employed. I ask unanimous consent to include a telegram giving the result of the splendid work thus far attained in the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 29, 1932.

ED HOLLENBACK,
National Chairman Child Welfare,
Assistant to Mark T. McKee, Executive Director:

Nation-wide total to date 117,535. MILLER.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech delivered by my colleague from New York [Mr. CELLER] over the radio on February 12 relating to Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. EMANUEL CELLER, over the radio, on February 12, relating to Abraham Lincoln:

ADDRESS OF HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Abraham Lincoln, the sixteenth President of the United States, was born February 12, 1809, in a log cabin in the hills of Kentucky.

A half century later, when he had received the nomination for the Presidency, a biographer asked him for some details of his early life. "Why," he said, "it is a great folly to attempt to make anything out of me or my early life. It can all be contained in a single sentence; and that sentence you will find in Gray's Elegy—

'The short and simple annals of the poor.'

That's my life and that's all you or anyone else can make of it."

Truly enough his whole life was dedicated to an attempt to rescue the American under dog and to pull the poor and lowly from between the upper and nether stones of oppression.

His life is also typical of American opportunity—the America that has permitted a barefoot boy like Lincoln to rise to the Presidency. During the last presidential election the two men who ran for President and the two men who ran for Vice President in the major parties were also the products of American opportunity. Smith was the son of a blacksmith. Curtis was born in an Indian Kaw village. Robinson and Hoover were farmer boys.

When Lincoln was 7 years of age, his family moved from Kentucky to Indiana and there for 10 years he was engaged in laborious work of all sorts—farming, rail splitting, running errands for shopkeepers. He only had a year's schooling, at intervals, but his love of learning was insatiable. His mother had taught him to read and he chose as his reading the Bible, Æsop's Fables, Pilgrim's Progress, and Robinson Crusoe. Out of these seeds of reading grew the great ardor that Lincoln had for books. He would walk 20 miles to borrow a book and 20 miles to return it.

At the age of 19, while employed on a river boat, he took a cargo down the Mississippi River to New Orleans. There he got his first awful impression of slavery. The scenes he saw at the New Orleans slave market were ineffaceable, and he then vowed to strike a telling blow at this nefarious traffic. He brooded much over slavery, and that brooding culminated in his greatest act of charity and beneficence, the Emancipation Proclamation, which, although only a militia measure put forth during the Civil War, had far-reaching effects and practically broke the shackles of slavery in this country.

He had a fierce love of honesty. They called him Honest Abe. The story is often told of his walking 3 miles to return a few pennies of overcharge.

In 1834 Lincoln was elected a member of the Illinois Legislature. He was reelected several times, and then was licensed to practice law. He was generous by nature. He was always more anxious to win his client's case than to get his client's money.

His skill at law and in the legislature caused him to be nominated for Congress. He was elected and was Representative from the central district of Illinois. His activity in Congress was noteworthy, and he gained a national reputation for his clear-cut speeches denouncing slavery.

It is difficult in a 15-minute address to give any detail of the life of this great man. One can only touch the high spots and mention but a few of the jewels in the diadem of his splendid character.

We often hear much said of Lincoln's kindly humor. It was the humor of the common people. He knew their aims and their aspirations and reflected their views, consequently, in the quiet and plaintive tales he told of them. When he was in the White House he was afflicted with a slight attack of varioloid or smallpox. Speaking of this, he said: "Now that I have something to give, no one wants to take it from me."

In his famous debates with Douglas on the question of slavery, he often used ridicule and humor to wither the Douglas arguments. Douglas once twitted him for having been a dramseller at Springfield. (Lincoln had obtained a license as an inkeeper for the sale of liquor.) Lincoln quickly replied, "When I was a liquor seller at Springfield, you were one of my best customers. I have since relinquished my stand on the one side of the counter, but you have never relinquished your stand on the other."

In an endeavor to squelch a loud and verbose opponent in one of his famous debates, he told of a traveler. The traveler had lost his way, and, as he went along, a storm broke forth, the rain came down in torrents, the sky was split with lightning, and the world seemed to come apart with deafening thunder. He sank deep in mud and mire and could see only the slight traces of his path in the intermittent flashes of lightning. Not being a praying man, he was, nevertheless, forced to his knees by a dreadful clap of thunder and in his praying said, "Dear God, let us have a little more light and a little less noise."

When the Sons of Temperance called upon Lincoln in the White House and indignantly denounced Grant on the score of his heavy drinking, Lincoln, who had great faith in Grant because of his recent victories, said to the dry brethren, "Please let me have the name of the brand of whisky that Grant drinks, as I want to send a barrelfull of it to my other generals."

We love Lincoln because of his great humility, his great magnanimity. Salmon P. Chase had been his Secretary of the Treasury. He was a great man and a great Secretary, but he often spoke ill of Lincoln. Lincoln knew that he went around peddling his grief in private ears in an endeavor to sow dissatisfaction with Lincoln; nevertheless when a vacancy occurred in the Supreme Court as a result of the death of Chief Justice Roger Taney, Lincoln, realizing Chase's fitness for the position, and disregarding his personal grievance, gave him the appointment.

While he was President thousands of applications came to him for the exercise of clemency in behalf of soldiers who were doomed to die because of desertion or other offenses. William Scott was a lad from Vermont who, after a tremendous march in the peninsular campaign, volunteered to do double duty to spare a sick comrade. He slept at his post. He was caught and sentenced to death. Lincoln heard of it and visited him and, placing his hands on the boy's shoulders, said, "My boy, you are not going to be shot. I believe you when you tell me that you could not keep awake. I am going to trust you and send you back to the regiment. Now, what I want to know is how are you going to pay my bill?" Scott thought that Lincoln meant how he, Scott, was going to repay him in money, and he said he could give him all his pay. Lincoln said, "My bill is a large one, and the only way you can repay me is by doing your duty." Scott promised to do his duty. Not long after he was desperately wounded and died, but not before he could send a message to the President that he had tried to be a good soldier; that he had paid his debt in full, and that he had died thinking of Lincoln's kind face and thanking him for the chance he had given him to fall like a true soldier in battle.

Lincoln showed his merciful nature in his attitude toward the vanquished South. Lincoln had desired, if possible, to bring about a gradual abolition of slavery and through local State action. He did not wish, for example, that the right to vote should be given in a wholesale manner to all negroes, the literate and the illiterate. He desired that the franchise at first be restricted to a few educated negroes. In this attitude Lincoln incurred the enmity of the radicals in Congress who claimed he was not sound on slavery.

He desired in all available ways to give the people of the South a chance to express their own wishes at their own elections. He refused to send a group of Northern carpetbaggers to the South and have them elected as Representatives and Senators in Congress from those States. He was afraid lest in the Southern elections to Congress that very thing should happen which after his death did happen, namely, the election of scalawags and carpetbaggers from the North as Representatives from the Southern States, whose elections were secured at the point of Federal bayonets. He wished to declare a general amnesty to all Southerners and wanted to welcome them back to the Union, provided, of course, that they respected the Constitution and all forms of law and order, and on condition, further, that they would respect the rights of the liberalized negroes.

Undoubtedly, had Lincoln escaped the assissin's bullet and lived, he would have met the fate of Andrew Johnson, who succeeded him to the Presidency at his death. Johnson was impeached because he sought to carry out Lincoln's policy of mercy to the South. Lincoln, too, would have been impeached had he lived. A band of fanatical radicals ruled Congress. They were headed by Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania. They seemed bent upon utterly destroying the South and ushered in the "tragic era" of reconstruction. There is a current play in New York entitled "If Booth Had Missed." It seeks to continue the life of Lincoln as if the bullet John Wilkes Booth fired in Ford's Theater had missed its mark and Lincoln had served out his term. It then goes on to state that his benevolence to the South incurred the extreme hostility of the radicals and they impeached him. The impeachment in the Senate failed of but one vote and then Lincoln was shot by an editor. This, of course, is but the imagination of the playwright; it catches, however, the spirit of liberality of Lincoln's program for Southern reconstruction.

If time would permit, I could tell you of his great addresses, particularly of his Gettysburg address at the dedication of the national cemetery. His remarks there are immortal. Curiously enough, the speech of the occasion was delivered by Edward Everett. Lincoln was to say but a few words at the close of the exercises. Everett's oration lasted two hours. It was a fine specimen of Civil War oratory, which, however, charms no more. Lincoln spoke for a little over five minutes, but his words sank deep. Nevertheless his hearers were unaware that a classic had been spoken which will endure forever in the English language.

All through his life Lincoln suffered much. His whole career seemed to be a struggle against insurmountable odds. His perseverance, however, always ended in victory. Trouble chastened him and made him great. The more severe the storms and the snows and sleet of the winter of the Northwest the finer and harder and more wholesome is the wheat. The more intense the white heat of the flame the more finely tempered becomes the steel. "Sweet are the uses of adversity." Trial and tribulation bent and tempered the mind of Lincoln and made him indeed one of our great immortals.

During the cataclysm of the Civil War, with death and destruction all around him, with his own ministers caballing against him, with his many erstwhile friends denouncing him as a traitor, he seemed to stand alone in the dark. His patience, his pitifulness, his courage, his sense of justice, all stand out in bold relief. Well did Stanton say at his death, "He belongs to the ages."

Although he was a man of no pronounced creed or belief, he nevertheless had a deep religiosity, and we can safely say in the words of the great Hebrew prophet Micah that Lincoln did justice, loved mercy, and walked humbly before his God.

A bill (S. 3884) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WAGNER:

A bill (S. 3885) to incorporate the Big Brother and Big Sister Federation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is absent by reason of a death in his family. At his request and on his behalf, I ask unanimous consent to submit 28 amendments to House bill 7912, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, the bill (S. 695) authorizing additional hospital and domiciliary facilities for veterans of all wars, was ordered to be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. NEELY, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills, and they were referred as indicated:

S. 1636. An act to provide for the erection at Parkersburg, W. Va., of a memorial monument to certain veterans of the Civil War; to the Committee on the Library.

S. 3123. An act for the relief of Russell C. Cross; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3803) for the relief of Edward N. Jerry, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INVESTIGATION OF PROHIBITION CONDITIONS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 172), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That a special select committee of 5 Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, 3 from the majority political party and 2 from the minority political party, is authorized and directed to investigate conditions in the United States under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the prohibition laws, with a view to determining particularly (1) the economic and social conditions existing under the present enforcement laws, (2) the extent to which such laws are violated, (3) the amount of revenue which would be received by the United States Treasury should the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors be permitted by law, and (4) generally any matters related to or affecting the prohibition question. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES IN 1932

Mr. DICKINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 174), which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the campaign expenditures of the various presidential, vice presidential candidates, and candidates for the United States Senate in both parties, the names of the persons, firms, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the method of expenditure of said sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to the subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influence, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto which would not only be of public interest but which would aid the Senate in enacting any remedial legislation or in deciding any contest which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate.

The investigation hereby provided for, in all the respects above enumerated, shall apply to candidates and contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaign terminating in the general election in November, 1932.

Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information as in its judgment may be reasonable or reliable. Upon complaint being made before said committee under oath by any person, persons, candidate, or political committee setting forth allegations as to facts which under this resolution it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, the said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after a hearing upon such complaint, the committee shall find that the allegations in said complaint are immaterial or untrue.

Said committee is hereby authorized, in the performance of its duties, to sit at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as it deems necessary or proper. It is specifically authorized to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœna or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, clerical, and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words.

Said committee is hereby specifically authorized to act through any subcommittee authorized to be appointed by said committee. The chairman of said committee or any member of any subcommittee may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee or any subcommittee thereof who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law.

The expenses of said investigation, not exceeding in the aggregate $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the chairman of the committee or the chairman of any subcommittee.

All hearings before said committee shall be public, and all orders or decisions of the committee shall be public.

The committee shall make a full report to the Senate on the first day of the next session of the Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which a certain amendment was agreed to. I announced then that if a subsequent amendment which I had offered was agreed to I would withdraw the motion, and if not I would insist upon it. The subsequent amendment has been agreed to. I understand, however, that to withdraw a motion to reconsider requires unanimous consent under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires a majority vote or unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WAIVER OF PROSECUTION BY INDICTMENT

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a few days ago attention of the Senate was directed to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the body at the other end of the Capitol [Mr. BYRNS] had introduced legislation designed to consolidate bureaus and departments and do away with overlapping and duplication of departmental activities and expenses; that in addition the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] had introduced a resolution designed to accomplish the same end; moreover, that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] had introduced a measure dealing with the same subject matter. Despite the fact that these three Members of the Congress had each separately sponsored legislation which was pending, a message came from the President suggesting, as though it originated at the White House, that legislation to that effect be undertaken.

On yesterday we received a message from the President suggesting certain reforms in judicial procedure. Among other things this was said:

WAIVER OF INDICTMENTS

Legislation should be enacted to permit an accused person to waive the requirement of indictment by grand jury. Where the accused admits his guilt, preliminary hearings and grand-jury proceedings are not necessary for his protection; they cause unnecessary expense and delay. In such cases the law should permit immediate plea and sentence upon the filing of an information. That would allow the accused to begin immediate service of his sentence without languishing in jail to await action of a grand jury, and would reduce the expense of maintenance of prisoners, lessen the work of prosecutors, and tend to speed up disposition of criminal cases.

Mr. President, in order that the situation may not be misunderstood, I invite attention to the fact that on January 5 last I introduced a bill the purpose of which was to accomplish exactly that result; that is to say, to permit the waiver of indictment where an accused person is willing to enter such waiver. That measure was considered by the Judiciary Committee and was reported favorably on February 10. It is on the calendar at this time. Reference was made to that fact on the last call of the calendar. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of the minority, invited attention to the importance of the measure and said that it should be considered by the Senate. The bill went over on the objection of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. President, I invite attention to these facts simply to let it be understood that for some time this matter has been considered by one branch of the Congress. Legislation dealing with it has been proposed by a Member of the Senate. It has been considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It is now on the calendar of the Senate and I hope will receive early consideration by the Senate itself. Perhaps with the statements of the President to which attention has been directed the measure may be hastened to its final passage.

In view of these facts, I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with a letter from the Attorney General under date of February 16, commenting upon the economies that would be effected by the passage of the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill and letter are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all prosecutions for capital or otherwise infamous crimes, in the courts of the United States and the courts of the District of Columbia, shall be by presentment or indictment of a grand jury unless the accused shall, in writing, and under such rules as the court may prescribe, expressly waive prosecution by presentment or indictment and consent to the filing of an information against him. In the event of such waiver the prosecution shall, with the approval of the court, be by information, and any judgment rendered and sentence imposed in any such case shall have the same force and effect in all respects as if the same had been rendered and imposed pursuant to a prosecution by presentment or indictment.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1932.

Hon. SAM G. BRATTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 12th instant, in which you ask to be furnished with an estimate of the economy which would be effected through the enactment of S. 2655, which provides for waiver of prosecution by indictment in certain criminal proceedings.

There would undoubtedly be a very substantial saving under such a provision, but its volume would depend primarily, of course, upon the number of accused persons willing to waive prosecution by indictment. There are no statistics available in the department upon which to base an estimate of what the number of such persons would be. Even if the number of such persons could be estimated with reasonable accuracy, it would still be necessary to estimate such items as the cost of producing witnesses before the grand jury in varying numbers and from varying distances in the respective cases and districts. I fear it would be impossible to predict with any degree of accuracy what the saving would be.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM D. MITCHELL, Attorney General.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill S. 2655 may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLAINE was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLAINE to Senate bill 2655: Page 1, line 9, after the word "him," insert a semicolon and the following: "except that no such waiver shall be allowed unless the accused has had a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner or other examining magistrate, which examination has resulted in a finding of probable cause."

LOANS TO VETERANS ON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SMOOT] a question with reference to the bill S. 272, relating to loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates, which was introduced in the Senate on December 9 and referred to the Committee on Finance. I wish to say that it has for its purpose the correcting of a manifest discrimination and injustice in the World War adjusted-compensation legislation. I call the Senate's attention to it because I desire to find out if it can be brought up, and, if it can not, I am going to move to discharge the committee at the first opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee has already reported about 50 such bills. The committee will meet again within a very few days, and, if there are any of them left upon the calendar, I am quite sure the committee will report them out either favorably or unfavorably.

Mr. BLACK. This is a bill, I will say to the Senator, that protects the holders of certificates who have had them for less than two years. Of course, many of the most patriotic soldiers did not obtain their certificates immediately, by reason of the fact that at the time they did not need the money.

Mr. SMOOT. No doubt at the next meeting of the committee we will reach the calendar upon which the bill referred to by the Senator appears. We have taken up the calendar in the effort to dispose of all that class of bills. The one to which he refers has evidently not as yet been reached, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact, as I have already said, that about 50 of them have been reported. If the Senator will just have a little patience, the committee is doing all it can and is working in every way it can to clear its calendar.

Mr. BLACK. I might say to the Senator that I do not want to be impatient; but so far as this bill is concerned, its terms are so simple and its merit is so unquestionable that it is difficult to understand why there should be the slightest delay, and I want to request that at next Tuesday's meeting the bill may be brought up before the committee.

PAYMENT OF WORLD WAR ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Out of order I ask permission to introduce a bill, and, because of the importance of the measure, I ask further permission to make a statement explaining it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Oklahoma will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill to be introduced by me proposes a plan for the payment immediately, and in full, of the obligation heretofore by law admitted to be due the ex-service men of the country. At this point I ask that the bill may be printed at length in the RECORD. I will not ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3874) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made through the several Federal reserve banks in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof). The payment in each case will be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate; except that if, at the time of application for payment under this section, the principal and interest on or with respect to any loan upon any such certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, (2) deduct the same from the amount of the face value of the certificate, and (3) provide for making payment in an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted. No interest shall be charged on any loan authorized by section 502 of such act, as amended, made after the date of approval of this act and no interest shall be charged to the veteran after such date on loans heretofore made by the administrator, but in the case of any such loan made by the administrator out of the United States Government life insurance fund, the fund shall be entitled to receive interest to the date of maturity of the loan at the rate agreed upon at the time such loan was made, but the amount by which such agreed interest exceeds the amount of interest payable to the date of approval of this act shall be paid out of the adjusted-service certificate fund created under section 505 of such act, as amended. Upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of providing funds for making the payments authorized in section 1, all amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund created by section 505 of such act, as amended, are hereby made available and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to provide for the issuance from time to time of bonds of the United States, to be known as "adjusted-compensation payment bonds," and to be delivered to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. An amount equal to the face value of all bonds so issued shall be credited to such fund and the bonds shall be distributed to the several Federal reserve banks as hereinafter provided. Such bonds shall be payable 30 years from their respective dates of issue; except that the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion provide for a later period of payment of any issue of such bonds if in his opinion it is necessary in the public interest. Such bonds shall be in such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall bear interest payable quarterly at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and shall have all the rights and privileges accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States. The total amount of such bonds shall not exceed the total amount required for the purpose of paying such adjusted-service certificates.

SEC. 3. Upon the receipt by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of any such bonds he shall distribute them to the several Federal reserve banks in proportion to the number of applications received from veterans within the various Federal reserve districts for payment of their adjusted-service certificates. Each bank receiving any such bonds is hereby authorized to issue Federal reserve bank notes in an amount equal to the face value of the bonds received by it, and such bonds shall be held as collateral security for such bank notes. Such notes shall be of such denominations (including denominations of $1 and $2) as may be authorized by the Federal reserve bank and except as provided in this act shall be subject to all the provisions of law relating to the Federal reserve notes. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made by means of such bank notes upon the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and in such manner as he shall prescribe. Such bank notes shall be legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated by contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues.

SEC. 4. (a) An application for payment under this act may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate

(1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

(b) If a veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed, it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this act on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of such act, as amended, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran, irrespective of any beneficiary designation.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act has been filed before the maturity of the certificate and the application can not be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor, he shall be entitled upon application made under section 302 of such act, as amended, to receive, at his option, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. This act may be cited as the "adjusted compensation payment act."

NUMBER OF VETERANS AND AMOUNT DUE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the number of ex-service men directly interested is approximately 3,658,527. The amount of the original obligation to such ex-service men was approximately $3,636,075,538. To date some 2,454,741 veterans have negotiated loans from the Government in a total sum of approximately $1,233,859,223.

On January 31, 1932, the approximate amount necessary to liquidate the balance admittedly to be due such ex-service men was $2,402,216,315, hence in order to pay now the full amount of such certificates it will be necessary to raise approximately the sum of $2,400,000,000. However, the fact that some 1,203,786 ex-service men have not applied for loans would indicate that such a number are not in special need of funds, and that in the event provision is made to pay the certificates in full a very large number of the ex-service men would not be in any hurry to cash their certificates.

It may be assumed that the 2,454,741 ex-service men who have already secured loans would make application immediately for the balance due, and if this assumption should be well founded it would take approximately the sum of $1,250,000,000 to make such immediate payment.

MONEY TO BE RAISED BY BONDS

The measure just introduced proposes a plan for raising the necessary funds and the payment of such funds to the beneficiaries under the certificates issued. The money is to be raised by a bond issue. Such bonds are to be of the kind issued to finance the construction of the Panama Canal—2 per cent consols—hence containing the circulation privilege.

The bonds are not to be offered for sale to the general public, as the public has neither the available cash nor the credit with which to purchase such bonds. All cash and credit now in the possession of the public should be retained for use in the payment of taxes, interest, debts, and the rehabilitation of industry. Instead of trying to sell such bonds to the public the bonds are to be issued and delivered to the several Federal reserve banks in proportion to the amount of money to be due the ex-service men residing in such reserve bank district.

Immediately upon the deposit of such bonds the several Federal reserve banks are authorized and directed to issue against such bonds Federal reserve bank notes for the full amount of such bonds, and thereafter upon the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs the said banks are to pay out such notes—the actual notes, not checks—to the ex-service men in full payment of the amounts due on their respective adjusted-service certificates.

PURPOSES OF BILL

The main purpose of the measure is to settle with the ex-service men. The money is admittedly due them and the only question is the time of payment. Under present economic conditions, with other groups asking and receiving direct money relief, it can not be held out of order for the veterans to ask for an adjustment of the obligations due them in advance of the date set by law for payment.

In addition to settling with the veterans perhaps the proposed legislation would have an even greater value as a general relief measure. All during this session efforts have been made to devise some plan to bring about an end to deflation and an end to depression. Until deflation is checked the depression will linger. A number of relief measures have already been passed, but to date none have had any appreciable effect on either the people or upon the business of the country. Prices are still falling, money is still hoarded, unemployment increases, business is stagnant, and conditions are gradually growing worse.

The loaning of Government money to industry with which to pay interest and obligations has not, will not, and can not be more than a temporary palliative, and until the great masses of the people can be reinvested with some buying power times will continue to grow worse rather than better. No bill yet passed has any substantial element of relief for one-half our population made up of the unemployed, the wage earners on part time and reduced salaries, the farmers, and the small business men of the country.

INCREASE MONEY IN CIRCULATION

The bill proposed will put something like $2,400,000,000 of actual money, not credit, in immediate circulation and distribution throughout every section of the United States and even in many parts of the world. At this time credit is frozen and hence practically nonexistent. Money—actual cash, gold, silver, and paper—is either hoarded or is not circulating. At this time we have only some five and one-half billion dollars of actual money outside the Treasury. Of this sum approximately one-half billion is in foreign lands. It is estimated $100,000,000 are in Cuba alone. Then we are advised that some one and one-half billions is hoarded. Of the balance, the 22,000 banks are required by law to keep almost $1,000,000,000 in actual money in their vaults to meet the demands of depositors. These sums together make approximately three billions of money which, while outside the Treasury and therefore theoretically in circulation, is not in actual circulation, and for all practical purposes such vast sum has little more effect upon prices and business than if such money were on the bottom of the sea.

When we subtract three billions now out of practical circulation we find we have only two and one-half billion dollars of money—gold, silver, and paper—left with which to transact the business of the greatest, strongest, and richest nation of the earth.

With this situation confronting us is it any wonder we are in the midst of the most severe depression in history? The proposed bill, if enacted into law, will practically double the amount of actual money in circulation and will place the additional money where it will do the greatest possible amount of good. The actual currency, in relatively small quantities, will be distributed to all parts of all the States.

DIVISION OF MONEY AMONG STATES

At the end of my remarks I ask to have inserted as Exhibits A and B, respectively, a statement of the approximate amount which will go to each State and also a statement of the approximate amount which will go to some of the larger cities in each of the several States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the exhibits will be printed in the RECORD.

(See Exhibits A and B at the conclusion of the speech of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma.)

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the direct and immediate effect of such a measure, if enacted into law, was stated in a signed article by H. L. Puxley, entitled "Purchasing Power," and printed in Sunday's New York Times. The concluding paragraph in this article is in part as follows:

The fact remains that the unemployed man wants the bread that the baker wants to sell him, the baker wants to buy the wheat that the farmer wants to sell him, the farmer wants to buy the tractor that the manufacturer wants to sell him, the manufacturer wants to buy for his machinery the man power that the unemployed man wants to sell him. Put $100 of idle Federal reserve bank credit into the unemployed man's hands, and he, the baker, the farmer, the manufacturer should begin to work together as a mechanical exhibit works when a dime is put in the slot.

BENEFITS CLAIMED THROUGH BILL

The enactment of the proposed measure will, I claim, bring about the following results:

First. It will adjust a long drawn-out controversy with the ex-service men by paying them in full the amount of an obligation now by law admitted and acknowledged.

Second. It will increase the actual cash in practical circulation to an amount almost double that in circulation to-day.

Third. It will distribute such additional circulation uniformly to all parts of the country.

Fourth. It will reinvest directly and immediately more than three and one-half million men and their families with buying power.

Fifth. It will help directly a class of our citizenship not yet reached by any relief measures passed or proposed.

Sixth. In addition to helping the veterans it will help the farmer by providing funds in the hands of millions with which to purchase the farmers' produce.

Seventh. In the same way the farmers will be benefited, the small stores, the large stores, wholesalers, factories, truck lines, railways, and banks will be benefited.

Eighth. To the identical extent that small business is benefited the big business concerns will profit in added business and consequent dividends.

Ninth. The bill, if enacted, will serve notice to the people that money, instead of getting scarcer and thereby dearer, will become more plentiful, and to such extent as it becomes more plentiful it will become cheaper.

Tenth. Such notice that money is to become more plentiful and thereby cheaper will have the immediate effect of thawing out the money frozen in hidden places, as well as the money in the safety deposit boxes and the credit and money in the bank vaults of the country.

Eleventh. Such notice will serve to cause merchants to place orders to replenish their empty shelves and such orders will react on wholesalers, factories, the producers of raw materials, and on each and every class of wage earners.

Twelfth. As money comes down in buying power, commodity prices of all kinds will rise, and this is the identical end that all, save the favored few, are now demanding should be accomplished.

The bill, if enacted into law and if it will do what I have outlined, will bring about the following concrete definite results:

(a) Will advance prices of commodities.
(b) Will decrease the value of all debts.
(c) Will decrease the value of all interest.
(d) Will decrease the value of all taxes.
(e) Will decrease the value of all salaries.
(f) Will help the debtor class.
(g) Will prevent further bankruptcies and bank failures.
(h) Will put money in circulation and make it possible for the people to pay their taxes in support of local, State, and the Federal Government.
(i) In addition to the foregoing it will, I claim, help immediately and directly the great masses of our people in that it will raise prices, stimulate business, add value to property, add value to the collateral now pledged for loans and thereby enable borrowers to repay the loans, and will bring a definite and speedy end to the worst depression in history.

Such results, I claim, will come from the enactment of this measure.

The bill does not suggest a single new or radical provision of legislation. As to the payment of the amount admitted to be due the veterans, the only question is as to when such payment will be made.

As to the method of raising the money with which to make payment to the ex-service men, I propose the same method we used to finance the construction of the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal bonds were issued and used as the basis for national-bank currency and the Federal reserve act makes such bonds eligible for the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes. The bill as introduced takes advantage of existing laws, principles, and practices and extends same in aid of our soldiers who added glory to our country and to our flag.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

RAILROAD MERGER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska, who has charge of the pending bill, has kindly consented that I might bring to the attention of the Senate a matter which I regard as of some importance. I shall not consume much of the Senate's time in its presentation. I ask that the resolution I send to the desk be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 173) was read, as follows:

Whereas it has been asserted within the last few days by the chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his official capacity, that through the formation of holding companies, and otherwise, numerous combinations of parallel and competing railroads engaged in interstate commerce have recently been made without authority of law, and particularly without first obtaining the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as provided in section 5 of the interstate commerce act; and

Whereas the same authority has stated that there have apparently been deliberate attempts, by means of such combinations, to evade, anticipate, and forestall action by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to restrict and impede said commission in the free and effective exercise of its lawful powers; and

Whereas it is a matter of common knowledge that in furtherance of the acts aforesaid large quantities of stocks and bonds in such holding companies and other corporations have been marketed and sold to private investors throughout the United States at prices far in excess of any present or prospective value, thus occasioning enormous losses to the purchasers thereof; and

Whereas a number of said combinations of railroads have been expressly declared by the commission to be in violation of law; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission an application of four railroad corporations in the eastern section of the United States which, if approved, would explicitly condone these violations of law and render the commission powerless to exercise its independent judgment as to the public interest in the consolidation of railroads in such territory: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be requested to inform the Senate as soon as practicable (1) whether such transactions constitute contracts, combinations, or conspiracies in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or attempts to monopolize or restrain such commerce, in violation of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as amended, commonly called the antitrust act; (2) in what respect, if any, such transactions differ from the operation condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Northern Securities case (193 U. S. 197); and (3) what steps, if any, have been taken or are contemplated by the Department of Justice for the enforcement in these instances of the antitrust laws.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it will be perceived that the resolution asks the opinion of the Attorney General as to whether the Sherman antitrust law has been violated by holding companies and parallel competing railroads engaged in interstate commerce. The Senate upon a number of occasions has requested the opinion of the Attorney General upon legal questions, particularly if they involved interpretations of the Constitution and Federal statutes or if they related to matters directly or indirectly within the cognizance of the Department of Justice.

Senators will recall the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Northern Securities case (193 U. S. 197), where it was held that an arrangement for the consolidation of two competing transportation lines constituted an illegal combination in restraint of interstate commerce and fell within the provisions of the Sherman Act.

The resolution just read refers to a statement made a few days ago by Hon. Joseph B. Eastman, a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which it is shown that mergers of competing railroad lines have been effected, that holding companies have been organized for the acquisition of various competing lines, and that such companies have obtained control of the capital stock of a large number of such competing lines.

Mr. Eastman refers to the report submitted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives (71st Cong., 3d sess.), which presents in a detailed and comprehensive way the steps taken by such railroads and holding companies. The report fortifies Mr. Eastman's statement and, I think, supports the views and conclusions expressed by him. The companies referred to proceeded without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission to execute a gigantic plan which contemplated bringing under the control of four systems subbstantially all of the railroads of the eastern part of the United States.

It would appear from the statement, and the report mentioned, that the proceedings taken to effectuate the desired object were in controvention of the provisions of the Sherman law. If the steps taken by the railways and holding companies are in violation of the Sherman law, the Department of Justice should take cognizance of the same. Applications are now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission which, if granted, would, in effect, condone what many believe to be illegal acts and amount to a pontifical blessing upon unrepentent transgressors.

It seems to me that the matter should be brought to the attention of the Department of Justice, and for that reason I am submitting the resolution which has just been read.

I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate to discuss the many facts and questions involved, but desire to submit a few excerpts, with connecting comments, from Mr. Eastman's statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Without objection, it may be done.

EXCERPTS FROM MR. EASTMAN'S STATEMENT AND COMMENTS

A number of roads have been acquired by holding companies and unifications "may be, and in some instances have been, effected without any supervision whatever by the commission." An important weakness of section 5 (of the interstate commerce act) grows out of the fact that it places "no control over the activities of the so-called holding companies in effecting the unification of railroad properties into systems." He then adds:

"1. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. completely controls and dominates the Pennsylvania Co., which is a holding company pure and simple. Through this holding company the Pennsylvania Railroad has, we believe, acquired control of the Wabash and the Lehigh Valley Railroads. These acquisitions have not been approved by the commission, and the Pennsylvania Railroad denies that the commission has any jurisdiction over them under section 5. In this instance the control which the Pennsylvania Railroad exercises over the holding company is so direct and complete that we are not prepared to concede that the acquisition is not subject to the provisions of paragraph (2) of section 5. Nevertheless the present wording of that paragraph leaves this jurisdiction open to question, and the Pennsylvania Railroad has proceeded in entire disregard of its provisions.

"2. The so-called Van Sweringen interests have, we believe, acquired control of the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Erie, the Nickel Plate, the Pere Marquette, the Missouri Pacific, and probably the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad. The bringing of these railroads under common control has not been sanctioned or approved by the commission, with the exception that it has authorized the Chesapeake & Ohio to acquire control of the Pere Marquette. The commission refused to approve the acquisition of control by the Nickel Plate of the Erie and the Chesapeake & Ohio (105 I. C. C. 425), and on another occasion it refused to approve the acquisition of control by the Chesapeake & Ohio of the Erie (138 I. C. C. 517). Nevertheless, all of the roads mentioned have been brought under common control. This has been done in large part through the agency of several holding companies, the most prominent being the Allegheny Corporation. The complicated interrelations of these holding companies and of the railroad companies in question are shown in detail in House Report No. 2789. Here the common control of the railroad companies, which is generally recognized as actual and effective, has been accomplished in a way which has been most cleverly disguised. It has not been done through any one holding company, but through a tangled maze of holding companies, which have utilized the resources of certain railroad companies, both directly and indirectly. Ultimate control seems to rest in certain individuals and banking concerns. There has apparently been a deliberate attempt to create a common control most difficult to analyze and equally difficult to trace and prove in a court of law. The cornerstone of the structure rests in the financial resources of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad. In three charts which are included in House Report No. 2789, between pages 878 and 879, a most interesting attempt has been made to analyze this maze in diagram form. In the third of these charts it is shown that the equities of the two then dominant individuals, O. P. and M. P. Van Sweringen, in the five principal railroads comprising the system, based on their proportion of contributed capital as of April 30, 1930, were as follows:

	Per cent
Nickel Plate	0.6879
Chesapeake & Ohio	.9815
Pere Marquette	.6387
Erie	.6015
Missouri Pacific	1.6904

"This system also has important interests in anthracite coal mining and distributing companies and in a so-called car-forwarding company.

"3. The third illustration is a holding company, known as the Pennroad Corporation, which has operated in the interest of the Pennsylvania Railroad, but is not controlled by it through ownership of stock. This holding company was created by the Pennsylvania Railroad ostensibly to protect its interests and those of its stockholders. The first right to subscribe to the stock of the Pennroad Corporation was given to the stockholders of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and control by the latter company was assured through a 10-year voting trust, under which three directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad were appointed to act as voting trustees, with authority to select their successors. This holding company has acquired controlling stock interests in the Detroit-Toledo & Ironton, the Pittsburgh & West Virginia, the Raritan River, and the Canton Co. Railroads, and substantial interests in the Boston & Maine, the Seaboard Air Line, and the New Haven, as well as lesser interests in other railroads. Coupled with stock interests which the New Haven has in the Boston & Maine and which the Pennsylvania Railroad has in the New Haven, the acquisitions of the Pennroad Corporation have given the Pennsylvania Railroad a very large voice in the affairs of the two principal New England railroads, just how large it is difficult to determine. All of these stock interests, controlling or otherwise, were acquired without any supervision by the commission, and under the theory that the commission is without jurisdiction. The Pennroad Corporation also has a controlling interest in the so-called car-forwarding company.

"Apart from section 5 of the interstate commerce act, the commission has certain jurisdiction under the Clayton Act over acquisitions of control, direct or indirect, of one railroad by another, or acquisitions of common control of two or more railroads, where it can be established that the effect of such acquisitions may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporations involved, or to restrain the commerce in which they are engaged, or to tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce. But the enforcement of the commission's authority to break up such combination after they have been put together is hedged about by many difficulties and probably no such authority exists under the Clayton Act in the case of certain of the unifications which have been accomplished in the manner above described.

"Whether or not all or any of these unifications are consistent with the public interests it is unnecessary for present purposes to determine. The important point to which we direct attention is that they have been accomplished entirely without supervision by the commission and without any opportunity on the part of the commission to consider the question of public interest. If, as we believe, it was the purpose of Congress to place the unification of the railway properties of the United States within the control of the commission, these illustrations show that wide opportunities exist for accomplishing such unifications without any such control in complete defeat of this purpose, and that these opportunities exist utterly irrespective of what the public interest may be."

Mr. Eastman further states that "unifications are being accomplished very largely in the two least desirable ways—either through purchases of stock or through leases," and adds that acquisitions of "control through stock purchases are also very likely to result in an increase in fixed charges, because the ordinary railroad can procure cash for such purchases, in the long run, only by selling more bonds."

Mr. Eastman refers to the idea prevalent in the railroad and financial world "that the only way in which railroads can be combined is by buying up stock, and that when stock is acquired quietly at low prices it is considered as a good deal, but it seldom works out that way. * * * If you will examine the record of the past, you will find that when one railroad has acquired control of another through purchase of stock, or when the same thing has been done by a holding company, the stock has usually been bought at high or comparatively high, prices."

He refers to the plan by which the Wabash Railroad was not able to market new issues of stock, and "could obtain cash for capital expenditures only from earnings or by further issues of bonds or increasing its indebtedness in other ways. It expended nearly $24,000,000 in buying Lehigh Valley stock at a price not very far from $100 per share. The same stock is now selling at about $16 per share. As a result of these purchases it was forced to increase its indebtedness very materially."

Mr. Eastman adds that "this method of putting roads together is one which has certain appeals to the bankers. They obtain commissions from negotiating or making purchases of shares; they obtain commissions or profits from the sale or disposition of the new bond or note issues which are necessary in order to secure cash for the purchases."

He referred to the method by which the control of certain railroads was obtained by the Pennroad Corporation, which "for all practical purposes is under the same control as the Pennsylvania Railroad; * * * that every railroad controlled by the Pennroad holding corporation was subjected, under the agreement, to the domination of certain directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad." * * * At present there is no effective control of the methods and processes of unification; that unifications can be accomplished without public supervision and regardless of what the public interest may be. * * * "In my opinion the operations of the holding companies have been contrary to the public interest in important respects."

With respect to the Pennroad Corporation, he adds that it "is so organized that its owners, the stockholders, have no voice in its management," and he quotes from House Report No. 2789, on page 632, in support of that statement.

Further quoting from House Report No. 2789, he states that: "9,090,000 shares of stock without par value were issued by the Pennroad Corporation at prices ranging from $15 to $17 per share. The proceeds were $141,285,000, but underwriting fees amounting to $5,251,586 were paid to Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Whether or not that firm suffered losses in connection with the underwriting which offset these fees in part, I do not know. It also received a commission of $327,397.70 in connection with the purchase of Canton Co. shares, and a smaller commission in connection with the New Haven shares. Being under no accounting restraint, the capital stock was set up in the balance sheet as a liability of $90,900,000, and the remainder of the proceeds, amounting to $45,133,414 after deducting the underwriting fees, were set up as surplus paid in."

Mr. Eastman refers to the operations of the Van Sweringen holding companies, and states that "one of them is known as the Allegheny Corporation, the property of which consists largely of shares of stock of other companies." Mr. Eastman states that the House report showed an "investment of $216,030,944 in stock and of only $23,886,812 in bonds. Against this investment it had bonds of its own outstanding amounting to $78,923,000 and accounts and notes payable of $18,382,659. Its stock issues accounted for $151,457,192, of which $120,499,746 was set up as a stock liability and $30,957,446 was carried as surplus paid in.

"* * * Apparently all of its securities were marketed through J. P. Morgan & Co., and House Report No. 2789 shows that that firm received commissions of $1,500,000 as compensation for services as purchaser of stock. What it made or lost in disposing of the stock and bonds to others has not been disclosed. Substantially all of the voting power was lodged in the common stock, which was carried on the books as a liability of $53,745,856. The preferred was carried at $66,753,900. The investment necessary for control of the Allegheny Corporation was further reduced by the fact that a large block of its common stock was held by another holding company, the General Securities Corporation, and a large block of that company's stock was in turn held by a further holding company called the Vaness Co."

Mr. Eastman illustrated the process of "pyramiding" by referring to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad. "A majority of the stock of that railroad was held on April 30, 1930, by the Chesapeake Corporation and constituted the great bulk of its assets. Against these assets it had issued $46,748,000 of its own bonds, and stock carried as a liability of $74,242,042. A majority of the stock of the Chesapeake Corporation was owned by the Allegheny Corporation, which in turn issued bonds, preferred stock largely without voting power, and common stock. A large block of Allegheny common was owned by the General Securities Corporation, and a large block of the stock of that holding company by the Vaness Co.

"The purchases of the Allegheny Corporation were largely made near the top of the market at comparatively high prices. House Report No. 2789 shows, for example, that it paid $159.87 per share for Pere Marquette stock, $60 for Erie common, $130.21 for Nickel Plate common, $80.87 for Missouri Pacific common, $136.05 for Missouri Pacific preferred, and $95.19 for Kansas City Southern common. In contrast with these prices, the Chesapeake & Ohio has recently purchased 46,200 shares of Pere Marquette stock from the Allegheny Corporation at $11 per share and has given a 4-year option to purchase 215,000 shares of Erie common at $13.25 per share.

"The outstanding vice, therefore, of the operations of the Van Sweringen holding companies was that, having purchased at high prices mere stock equities in various railroad companies, they made these investments a basis for the issuance of bonds and preferred stock which they sold to investors, retaining control through a margin of common shares and reducing the investment necessary for such control by further pyramiding processes. The financial structure thus created was manifestly overloaded with fixed charges, and a source of danger if the earnings of the underlying railroads should be reduced by reason of changes in economic conditions. The whole set-up was, in my judgment, unsound and inconsistent with the public interest. Where such a situation is created, moreover, there is danger that it will affect unfavorably the affairs of the underlying railroads, not only because of the reflected influence upon their credit but also because of the temptation to drain the resources of the railroads to meet the heavy load of fixed charges or preferred dividend payments.

"I call your attention to the fact that these unsound operations were sponsored by the two leading banking firms of the country. The Pennroad Corporation was sponsored and its securities were sold by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the Allegheny Corporation was sponsored and its securities were sold by J. P. Morgan & Co.

"* * * I turn now to the operations of the railroads controlled by the holding companies. * * * The systems which have, in effect, been put together through the holding companies are inconsistent with the commission's consolidation plan. * * * Whether or not, however, if the commission refuses to sign on the dotted line and approve the 4-system plan as proposed, the carriers will be willing to give up any controls acquired through holding-company operations, remains to be determined."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What does the Senator desire to have done with the resolution?

Mr. KING. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That reference will be made.

THE SILVER QUESTION

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a paper relative to the silver question by C. M. Zander, executive secretary of the Board of Directors of State Institutions of Arizona and taken to the Silver Conference held in Denver, February 15, 1932, by Attorney John E. Russell, of Prescott, Ariz.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN A SURVEY OF THE POSITION OF SILVER IN THE WORLD'S ECONOMY, THE FOLLOWING FACTS WOULD INDICATE THE WHOLE PROBLEM SHOULD BE THOUGHT OUT BEFORE IT IS FOUGHT OUT

The silver question undoubtedly involves the whole subject of finance. It is unquestionably safe to state that the decline in the value of silver has a vital influence on the present world depression. It is further self-evident that in a Republic like ours, no change in the position of silver can be brought about unless it comes from a great section of the people themselves.

It is astounding and discreditable that the indifference to this question is so widespread in business circles. As usual there is great confusion of opinion, much misstatement of facts, and too much abstruse language among those who are discussing the question. All the naked facts, having any bearing on the question, should be speedily assembled and published in such simple terms so the man on the street and the man in the furrow could readily understand.

A proper study of this question most certainly involves answers to the following questions:

What is money?

How much should every individual know about it?

What is the history of finance?

Teaching as we do the history of every other human activity in the public schools, has ever a comprehensive history of finance been compiled and taught in the public schools? How few hundreds of people know anything about the real dealings of finance? Is there any advantage to anyone in keeping the people ignorant on the subject?

Is it true that gold has been used longer than silver as money?

Is it not a fact that silver was first used in moon worship and gold in sun worship by the most ancient people of both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, and is it a further fact that all those people remaining more nearly stationary to the civilization existing at the time of moon worship, have used almost exclusively silver as money, continuously, since they discarded iron and copper?

What are the other historical facts such as the use of silver by Abraham, the betrayal of Christ, and the indicated ratio between gold and silver hinted by Atahualpa the Inca when to the room full of gold he gave to Pizzaro for his ransom he vainly added two rooms full of silver?

If there is any sentiment between gold and silver usage, does not silver have the better of it?

What were the necessities that induced ancient people to use both silver and gold for money?

What were the reasons the most advanced nations of modern times used both metals as money down to the present day? Was it mere habit?

According to history and prior to the first assault upon silver in 1873, has silver fluctuated more than gold? Has gold maintained more constant intrinsic value than silver?

Does history show there is science and psychology in inflation and depression?

Do the international bankers have the facts in this connection compiled?

Has such knowledge been discovered and rediscovered since earliest times?

Do the great modern banking houses know about the great banking house of the Egibi of ancient Babylon which amassed great wealth loaning money to kings and who, like the Rothchilds, took their sons into their business?

Have the international bankers a complete record of all the inflations and depressions, their causes, effects, and the overt acts, if any, on the part of powerful financial houses during the past hundred years? Would such a record in the possession of anyone financially able to act give a tremendous advantage over everyone else? Should not such a record be given to the public?

Did the New York banks in 1893 send a letter to the banks throughout the country ordering them to retire one-third of their circulation and call in one-half of their loans in order to cause a panic and ruin business as a strategic move to debase silver? Was the order carried out?

What was the "Crime of '73"?

Can the dominating banking interests be trusted to act without being influenced by special interest? Will the ex-treasurers of the United States give any historical facts in this connection?

Did the United States Treasury in 1920 start a smashing drive against silver when it was $1.30 an ounce?

Did India at the dictation from London in 1925 begin the demonetization of silver?

Have France and other countries followed suit since then?

Were these actions taken on the urgency of the business people of these countries or at the command of the large holders of gold of these countries? Do the people of these countries realize what has taken place?

Is the decline in the value of silver due to increase in volume or to debasement as money? Does the record of production of silver show an increase or decrease?

Has the reduction in the value of silver by more than one-half since 1925 destroyed the purchasing power, by the same ratio of more than one-half the people of the earth? Who is it, if this is true, that has the temerity to say this does not directly and indirectly affect business in this country? Has our trade with India and China fallen off since 1925?

Suspending history temporarily the following questions may be pertinent to the demonetization of silver:

Does the volume of business fix the demand for money?

Is it the demand for the gold and silver in money rather than its intrinsic worth that fixes the value or purchasing power of the metal?

Should the ratio of volume of money to volume of business be approximately maintained?

If the volume of currency is contracted, is the purchasing power of the remaining currency increased? If so, why? Are the owners of the remaining currency benefited by such contraction? Are the owners of business, the owners of property, and the payers of debts injured? Do not the debt payers include all the interest payers, both public and private? What is the total public and private debt, including the annual interest thereon, of this country?

If gold and silver were both used as money and silver were destroyed as such, would the gold enhance in value? Would the possessors of gold become more wealthy, and would they object either at home or abroad to the destruction of silver? Who or how many in this country own the major part of the gold or money of the country?

Does the control itself of money give additional power other than purchasing value? Is a small volume easier to control than a large volume? Is this additional reason for the demonetization of silver? The control and manipulation of how much money is necessary to depress business in this country? Is that control in the hands of a few people?

Assuming the concentration of wealth in this country may have bearing on the problem, the following questions of fact and history arise:

If there is psychology or natural cause for inflation and depression, can this condition be aggravated by manipulation of money, credits, and other methods? If so, could stocks and property be acquired during the intensified depression at robbery prices, held and sold during distorted inflation at frenzied figures?

Has there been a repeated concentration of wealth after each depression? Who was benefited in 1873? Did the international owners of gold in 1893 absorb a great amount of additional wealth purchased at depressed value with enhanced gold? Is not the greatest absorption in history going on right now with the purchasing power of gold enhanced by the recent slump in silver? Just who was it that got out of the stock market in 1929 and left the silly public to hold stocks at tremendously inflated prices paid for in hard cash? Were these stocks so sold to the public acquired during the slump of 1921?

Was there during the war boom of 1919 a great conversion into cash of property acquired during the slump of 1914 and 1916?

What has been the concentration of wealth since 1873? Who are the people that possess this concentration? Is it sacrilege to inquire? Does this wealth gravitate to the control of international bankers, owners of gold, and dealers strictly in finance? Is such concentration of wealth a good thing for the people who have it? Is it according to divine guidance, and is it ordained for the sound safeguarding of the Nation, as has been intimated?

The merit in restoring silver may be established by answers to these questions:

Could silver be restored to its price level of 1925 by international agreement? Would the holders of gold object?

If it takes twice as much property to pay a dollar debt now as it did in 1929, and if the restoration of silver would place the dollar back to its 1929 basis, should the debtors be denied the right to settle their 1929 debts with 1929 dollars instead of 1932 dollars?

If silver could be restored to its position of 1925, should the business of the world, and this Nation, be denied the privilege of doing business with half the population of the earth whose purchasing power would be doubled?

If silver has been debased by governmental edict, can it not be restored by the same method?

Would it be necessary to have united action?

Would not China and India join this country, and would not then England be forced to join to hold her Hindu trade, and following this event would not all the rest of the nations come in?

What is the probable trade that could be developed with the silver-using countries? Is this trade not more promising, if largely commanded by this country, than any trade it now enjoys?

If bimetalism for this country alone at some fixed ratio is scouted, could not only the silver be monetized which was acquired in trade with the silver countries? Would not this procedure capture the foreign trade of the silver-using nations to the exclusion of the gold countries?

Is there sound reason for the United States not to adopt bimetalism? Did not the addition of new gold from Alaska and the Rand in South Africa in 1898 to the currency of that time, have a similar effect that the addition of silver to the currency of to-day would have? Would not the revival of business solve the debt cancellation problem?

If it is answered that bimetallism would deflate the purchasing power of the American dollar, is it not true that it would not decrease the purchasing power of the American people because if the dollar was cheaper, there would be enough more dollars to make up the difference? Anyway, does trade mean dealing in dollars or the exchange of commodities? How many centuries was the business of the world carried on without any money?

If it is answered that to cheapen the dollar would impair the prestige of the dollar and Americans abroad, can it not be asserted that prestige does not concern a man who figuratively does not have a dollar to be proud of?

If it is answered that the addition of silver would dilute the value of gold and thus drastically reduce the great fortunes in gold, now such majestic monuments to modern genius as to command the admiration of the world, then if these great fortunes were the result of the destruction of silver since 1873, would it not be simple justice to let silver distribute those fortunes back to the people from whom they were taken? Is there any difference between the plunder of conquest and the plunder of finance where both result in ruined fortunes and blasted hopes that have been earned and are well deserved?

If the owners of gold object to the restoration of silver, would it not be proper to ascertain what methods and channels they have at their command, what corporations, publications, and individuals they can dominate in their campaign of opposition? Would this information not be valuable so that the people would know who was behind everybody and every influence in the discussion?

If the debasement of silver has anything to do with the present depression, is it not possible for the people this time to learn how to protect themselves? Must the country suffer again and again this scourge? Is it uneconomic and unstatesmanlike to insist that the general public shall be allowed to retain their savings and their homes and to prevent suicides, ruined health, and devastated lives, even though such a program would deny those savings to the owners of large accumulations of money?

To accumulate and distribute all the information on the silver question the United States Senate is probably the best constituted authority available to the public. This great body is now so constituted as to enable it to act without fear or favor and to probe the subject to its naked ribs. It can act without the taint of partisanship, and therefore its findings would command the respect of the country. When the Nation was in possession of the facts so determined it would be in the mood to settle this matter so that the stability of silver would go down through the centuries of the future the same as it has come up through the centuries of the past.

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I move to strike out paragraph (e), beginning with line 17, on page 6, and ending with line 19; also in line 23, on page 6, beginning with the word "and" and ending with the word "property," in line 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is it possible to couple two amendments in the same motion? Would not the question have to be divided and a vote taken first on striking out lines 17 to 19?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President; but may I say that I think a division could be compelled. The Senator has the right to offer his amendment in any form that he chooses.

I rose for the purpose of asking the Senator from Rhode Island to make clear the object of his amendment. It is difficult to follow the amendment by a mere reading. If the Senator will restate it, perhaps it will be helpful.

Mr. HEBERT. My amendment, Mr. President, is to strike out lines 17, 18, and 19 in paragraph (e) on page 6, and, as germane to that, the words beginning in line 23, "and also to those public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property," ending in line 24.

The paragraph provides that no injunction may issue unless it appear—

> That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

And also that those public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property shall all be notified before an injunction may issue. It has occurred to me that the provisions of paragraph (d) of this section, which reads, "That complainant has no adequate remedy at law," would fully cover all that is included in paragraph (e) and, moreover, that it would be practically impossible to show by the testimony of the law-enforcing officers that they are unable or unwilling to afford protection.

I assume that none of the law officers would admit that he was unwilling to enforce the law, and perhaps few, if any, would admit that they were unable to do so; but the more serious objection to the section as it is worded is the requirement that all of the officers charged with the duty to enforce the law shall be notified. It is easy to contemplate what an obligation rests upon complainants under this provision if in a city like New York, for instance, the officers charged with the enforcement of the law are to have notice before an injunction may issue; but that, of course, is an extreme case.

If this provision were limited to the sheriff of the county or the chief of police of the city where the property is located, there might be some reason for its inclusion in the bill; but, as this section reads, it seems to me to be impossible of enforcement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I hope very much this amendment will not prevail—at least, the first part of it.

It seems perfectly obvious that the first resort for protection against the destruction of property ought to be to the officers of the law who are charged with the duty of protecting the property of citizens. There may be some objection to the language found in lines 22 and 23 of the same page, which requires as a prerequisite that relief should be sought from those public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property. In a city I suppose every police officer is charged with that duty, and in a county the sheriff and all of his deputies; and, of course, it was not intended that demand should be made of every policeman in a city, or every deputy sheriff in a county.

I desire to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the situation would be quite met, and I am sure in accordance with the views of the committee, if the resort were confined to the chief of the force charged with the duty of protecting the property of the complainant; and the desired end would be reached by inserting after the word "to" in line 23, the words "the chief of," and after the word "officers," the words "of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed," so that it would read:

> Such hearing shall be held after due and personal notice thereof has been given, in such manner as the court shall direct, to all known persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the chief of those public officers of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect complainant's property.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that there would necessarily be some ambiguity in that provision? For instance, there are counties where there are many cities, and there are, therefore, many chiefs of police in one county. The question arises whether all the chiefs of police in a county would have to be notified, though many of them would have no concern with a disturbance in any given city.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the chief of police in the city in which the injury has been committed or threatened would be notified, and the sheriff of the county in which the injury is threatened or committed must be notified.

Mr. HEBERT. I think perhaps the amendment suggested by the Senator could be worked out, but as it was reported by him a moment ago, it seemed to me to admit of some ambiguity. I think it could be worked out so as to provide that the chief of police in the city where the offense is committed shall have notice of the proceedings, and in the case where there is no city in a county that the sheriff of the county shall be notified.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can see no reason why both should not be notified if there are both. If there is a chief of police in the city and a sheriff of the county, it is the duty of all of them; it is a concurrent duty.

Mr. HEBERT. Neither do I see why they should not both be notified, except that, as I said a moment ago, there may be several chiefs of police in the same county.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; but the chief of police of the city in which the injury has been committed or threatened would be notified.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senators are evidently thinking of a strictly localized dispute, but if we will consider a difficulty that is not localized, I think we will see how impossible of fulfillment these requirements are.

Let us suppose, for example, that a strike occurred on the Southern Pacific Railroad, and that one of the great railway unions announced that it was out to destroy the property of that road anywhere along the line. Under this provision you would have to notify every policeman, every sheriff, every deputy sheriff, from New Orleans to Portland, Oreg., if that is where the Southern Pacific ends.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It goes even to Seattle.

Mr. REED. Of course, that would be equivalent to saying that there would be a complete denial of relief. If, then, the road filed a bill in the State courts, and the case were removed to the Federal court, as it could be on diversity of citizenship, this rule would again come into play, and the injunction could not be issued even in the most flagrant case without this impossible prerequisite of notifying everybody along the line who had to do with law enforcement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The criticism, I think, is very well founded, but there would be no difficulty at all in notifying the chief of police of the city and the sheriff of the county through which the railroad goes.

Mr. REED. Not a bit; but I think sometimes we reach wrong conclusions by having in mind illustrations of strictly localized difficulties. I agree with the Senator that his suggested change would be a great improvement, that notice to the local chief of police might well be given in a localized dispute. But I think we ought to be careful not to make it utterly impossible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I call the attention of the Senator to the condition in the case he cites, the Southern Pacific running from New Orleans to Seattle. It runs over the Northern Pacific tracks from Portland to Seattle, but it would be operating exactly the same. Of course, the Senator is aware of the fact that it has its local representatives, and ordinarily it has its local attorney in every county along the line. So that just tapping the wire would be all that would be necessary, and the sheriff of the county or the chief of police would be called upon to defend the company's property against threatened injury.

Mr. REED. That is true, Mr. President; but all proceedings would have to be tied up in court until such time as the return of the service of the notice might be made, and if the court in which the bill was filed was in New Orleans, let us say, no proceedings could be taken until proof of service on the chief of police in Seattle was received in New Orleans. It might effectively result in a denial of relief altogether.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The injunction would go only against the injury in Louisiana. Of course, the court has no jurisdiction beyond its territory.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. REED. Of course, the action in equity is a proceeding in personam, and, having jurisdiction of the person, the court could restrain damage anywhere, even in another country, if it once acquired jurisdiction of the defendant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the court acquired jurisdiction; but it could not possibly enforce a decree of the district court for Louisiana by reason of injury committed in the State of California.

Mr. REED. Oh, I think so, if the court had jurisdiction of the defendant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Supreme Court of the United States, the Senator will remember, took notice of that kind of a decree, indeed, in the case of the famous Wilkerson decree, which went against all the world, everybody who had notice of it.

Mr. REED. Ah, that is different; I am talking of a case where jurisdiction over the person of the defendant has been acquired by service within the jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. REED. Then a contempt could be committed and would be punished, although the act constituting the contempt occurred in some foreign jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator will observe that the persons who are actually served are limited in number, and that would be very useful to any company seeking an injunction.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me, to begin with, that Senators are imagining things which will never happen. The statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania of this imaginary case which brought on the discussion is this: Suppose, he says, that a big railroad labor organization announced that they were going to destroy all the property of the Southern Pacific Railroad. I have an idea that if we all live to be as old as Methuselah we will never see anything of that kind occur, to start with.

Mr. REED. The Senator has forgotten, then, some of the things we saw in Pittsburgh in 1877, when they set out to destroy everything the Pennsylvania Railroad owned, and made a pretty good start at it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is almost beyond my imagination to think that one of the four big brotherhoods of railroad engineers, conductors, brakemen, or trainmen would announce to the public, "We are going to destroy all the property of the Southern Pacific Railway." The object they were seeking to accomplish through the strike would be dead the very minute they would make such an announcement.

Mr. REED. I did not suggest that the four big brotherhoods would do it. I said a big union might intend to do that. And I did not suggest that they would announce it publicly; they might announce it among themselves.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator think that any of those railroad unions would even announce it among themselves?

Mr. REED. I do not think those particular four big brotherhoods would, because they are composed of intelligent men and are led by intelligent, patriotic men; but that is not true of all unions, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. NORRIS. There may be some, but they are not running the Southern Pacific Railway or the Burlington Railway or the Union Pacific Railway. We only have to go back a few days, to the conference which met in Chicago between the executive committee of the presidents of the railroads of the country and the representatives of the four big brotherhoods. They were in conference for a week or two, and at the end of that conference the men surrendered $250,000,000 of their salaries in order that the presidents of the railways, without sacrificing any of their salaries, might continue to pay dividends on the various railroads they represented.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator seems to be trying to put me in the position of hostility to those four railroad brotherhoods. I want the Senator to be fair with me on that.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to be fair with the Senator, and I am not trying to do what he suggests. The Senator has not caught my idea at all. I am trying to show, to begin with, that the Senator's stated case was almost an imaginary one. That is all I am trying to show. I do not want the Senator to think that I believe he is a bolshevik, or anything of that kind. I would take his word for anything on earth for which he would give it to me, and his note quicker than that. I do not want the Senator to get such an idea. I had not such a thing in mind, although it may be that that construction might be put on what I said. I do not want anybody to put such a construction on my statement. I am not impugning the Senator's motives in the least, and I do not intend to. I concede his sincerity, as well as his ability and his logic and his judgment. But I wanted to show, to begin with, there was an unreasonable hypothesis.

This bill, in the particular respects in which it has been attacked now, is something probably never undertaken before. It provides that before one can get an injunction, the public officers charged with the duty of protecting the complainant's property shall be unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection. Why is not that fair? The object of an injunction is to protect property. It is not a criminal proceeding, it is a civil proceeding; it is an equity proceeding, the sole object of which is to protect property.

Another provision which no one will dispute, one which has been included in all similar measures, one which has been a rule in equity since there has been such a thing as equity jurisprudence, is found in subdivision (d), that the complainant shall not have an injunction if he has an adequate remedy at law. If the officers whose duty it is to protect plaintiff's property are able to protect it, why should the Federal court come in and issue an injunction to protect that property, restraining anybody from doing damage? It seems to me that subdivision (e) states only an ordinary fact, which no one would dispute.

As to the notice, cases might be imagined where it would be difficult to give it. A notice is for the benefit of the other side, as well as for the defendant's side. I think, without any change in this clause at all, no court would deem it necessary, in a city, for instance, to notify every policeman in the city, if the bill were left just as it is. But I have no objection to providing, as the Senator from Montana has suggested, for notice to the chief of police, if that is desired, or applying to a county, the sheriff. We do not know what the proceeding will apply to. When a case is presented to a judge he will know whether it ought to be the sheriff of a county, the chief of police of a city, or both, or the officers of two cities or three cities. But I do not anticipate that there would be such a thing as naming every constable in a county, for instance. The court would not name even the deputy sheriff. If he named the sheriff, that would be sufficient. So it seems to me that if this amendment is voted down, if the Senator from Montana or any other Senator will offer an amendment that will make it plainer, I will have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Are we voting upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, or was it suggested as an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has not proposed an amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me state the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] moves to strike out subdivision (e) on page 6, and likewise to strike out, in lines 23 and 24, page 6, the words "and also to those public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property." I ask that the amendment be rejected, and if it is rejected, I shall then move to amend lines 23 and 24 so they will read:

And also to the chief of those public officers of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed charged with the duty to protect complainant's property.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I can very well see why the section should remain in the bill because I can understand, when a complainant in equity is asking an injunction, that he should be able to show that he is not able to protect his property through the ordinary processes of law. But I can not see any real reason why notice should be given to any officer, because we can have in an equitable proceeding no substantial relief against an officer. The courts certainly would not undertake to direct him or enter any judgment against him or in any wise affect him by its final order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me tell the Senator what induced the committee to include those words.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Under subdivision (e) it will be observed that the complainant seeking the injunction must represent that the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

Mr. GEORGE. I quite agree that that ought to be included. I think it may well be included.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the Senator agrees that it may well be included, but we do not want to make that imputation against the officers without giving them an opportunity to reply to it, and so notice is to be given to them that they may come in and say, if they can say so, "We are perfectly able to take care of the situation." We do not want to allow their integrity as officials to be impugned without giving them an opportunity to be heard on the matter.

Mr. GEORGE. I can see how that is commendable, and yet it is wholly unnecessary because there is no need of making anybody a party to the litigation unless we are going to have some substantial relief against that party. I rather think it is a dangerous provision for the reason that the defendant officers or respondent officers may come in and swear off the equity of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark that the officers will not be made parties to the proceeding at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the notice was to make them parties.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no. Observe the language:

Such hearing shall be held after due and personal notice thereof has been given, in such manner as the court shall direct, to all persons against whom relief is sought, and also to the chief of those public offices of the county or city—

And so forth.

No relief is sought against them, but they are given an opportunity to come into court.

Mr. GEORGE. It is not the purpose of the bill to make them formal parties?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By no means.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, that removes, of course, the objection I had in mind. If they were made formal parties we would have frequent cases where the whole equity of the bill would be sworn away by the respondents.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have previously asked that the motion be divided. I think under the rule I am entitled to insist upon my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state that the amendment of the Senator from Montana applies to the part to be stricken out and must be voted on first, so the question on the amendment of the Senator from Montana comes before the other question. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 23, after the word "to," insert the words "chief of," and in the same line after the word "officers," insert the words "of the county and State within which the unlawful act has been threatened or committed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] asks that the motion to strike out be divided. The clerk will report the first part of the motion.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, strike out lines 17 to 19, both inclusive, in the following words:

(e) That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barbour	Dickinson	Keyes	Smith
Barkley	Dill	King	Smoot
Bingham	Fess	La Follette	Steiwer
Black	Fletcher	Lewis	Stephens
Blaine	Frazier	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	George	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Glass	McNary	Townsend
Brookhart	Glenn	Metcalf	Trammell
Broussard	Goldsborough	Morrison	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Gore	Moses	Wagner
Bulow	Hale	Neely	Walcott
Byrnes	Harrison	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hatfield	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hayden	Oddie	Waterman
Connally	Hebert	Patterson	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes, on page 6, to strike out lines 17 and 18 and 19, in the following words:

(e) That the public officers charged with the duty to protect complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrain from voting.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. METCALF (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. METCALF. I have a general pair with him, and will therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEBERT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and therefore I withdraw my vote. I understand that if the Senator from Louisiana were present he would vote "nay" on the pending amendment.

Mr. JONES. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] and will vote. I vote "nay." I am advised that if the Senator from Pennsylvania were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the following Senators are absent on official business:

The Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

I also desire to announce that if present the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—16

So Mr. HEBERT's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will now report the second portion of the divided amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to strike out on page 6, line 23, all after the word "sought," down to and including the word "property" in line 24, as amended, as follows: "And also to the chief of those public officers of the county and city within which the unlawful acts have been threatened or committed, charged with the duty to protect complainant's property."

Mr. HEBERT. The amendment which I proposed was to strike out beginning with the word "and" in line 23 and ending with the word "property" in line 24, on page 6. My understanding was that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had suggested a modification of that amendment, and I am quite in accord with the modification that he suggests.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That modification has been accepted.

Mr. REED. That has been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HEBERT. Very well.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word about this amendment. It proposes something totally new and fantastic in legal procedure. It is proposed to compel notice to be given in a pending lawsuit to officials who are not parties to it in any sense and against whom no relief whatever is asked.

The Senator from Georgia very well brought out the point a little while ago that as nothing is asked in the way of relief against these officials there is no reason why they should be made parties defendant, as, in fact, they are not made parties defendant. That being so, there is no reason why they should be notified as if they were parties defendant.

If their presence is desired in court, there is a perfectly sufficient method of bringing them in by subpœna. It very often happens that persons not parties to the litigation and against whom relief is not asked are needed at the trial, but a subpœna is perfectly adequate to bring them in. There does not seem to me to be any necessity for serving a notice of the suit upon them as if it were a lis pendens involving some matter in which they had an interest so that they had to be brought into the record by service of process in that way. It does not seem to me that it adds anything to the security of the complainant or anything to the security of the proper defendants in the lawsuit. Simply because it provides a species of freak procedure, I hope that it will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it seems to me because there is no precedent for this is no good reason why it should not be done. There had to be a beginning in the case of all procedures in the law. They came into being by reason of conditions which the courts were called upon to meet. It seems to me eminently advisable, when a charge is made against public officers that they are either unwilling or unable to protect property, that they should have an opportunity to come in and be heard in relation to the accuracy of that charge. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator from Montana any doubt that they would be brought in by subpœna in the usual way?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They could be brought in in that way, but why issue a subpœna for them? The complainant goes into court and charges that these officers are negligent or the situation is such that they can not cope with it. Why issue a subpœna to get them in? Notice is sent to them that the application is being made.

Mr. REED. Very good, and yet they are not parties to the suit, and no relief is asked against them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; they are merely given an opportunity to refute the charge.

Mr. REED. Ah, but they are not; they are not parties; they are not even entitled to be called to the stand, unless one of the parties puts them on the stand. This gives them no relief; it tells them that there is a lawsuit going on, which, of course, they would learn from the newspapers, anyway; and then, having received the notice, there is nothing they are empowered to do. They can not demand that they be heard at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They can find means to communicate their views to the court.

Mr. REED. I am quite sure one of the parties would be glad to call them; but why, unless there is some sense in it, adopt this novelty in judicial procedure when we know that the process of subpœna is perfectly adequate? I am quite unable to see it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I inquire if there are to be no further amendments offered to the bill?

Mr. HEBERT. The minority will offer no further amendments. I understood the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] desired to offer an amendment when the amendments proposed by the minority had been concluded. I do not now see him in the Chamber.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barbour	Dickinson	Keyes	Smith
Barkley	Dill	King	Smoot
Bingham	Fess	La Follette	Steiwer

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to ask one or two questions particularly of the members of the bar who are present. I find myself in a position where lack of training at the bar, lack of a legal education, and lack of familiarity with the practice of the Federal courts places me in a position of embarrassment when confronted with a technical measure of this kind.

I have endeavored to follow the debates as far as I could. I find in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, just at the end of the debate, a communication to the Vice President from the chairman of the committee on jurisprudence and law reform of the American Bar Association. It has been my practice, whenever I could, in matters connected with legislation affecting the statute law and affecting appointments to the courts to depend on opinions of the great bar associations of the State and Nation.

My first question, Mr. President, is why it should be that the American Bar Association has repeatedly, at its annual meetings, taken action in opposition to legislation of this kind.

I find in this statement on page 5060 of the RECORD that at Memphis in 1929 the American Bar Association authorized "continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts or decreasing the power thereof."

Again, in 1930, the association adopted a recommendation recommending "continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof."

Again, in the same year, in regard to a bill introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], the association went on record in opposition to a measure similar to the one now before us.

And again, in 1931, the association apparently went on record in opposition "to all legislation limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof, adhering strictly to the instructions of the association at Memphis in 1929 and at Chicago in 1930."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield in just a moment.

As I say, to a layman, unfamiliar with the practice in the courts, this action of the bar association seems to be emphatically opposed to this legislation, and leads to a query on my part as to why so many distinguished lawyers on the floor of the Senate are supporting it.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana, and I hope he will answer the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rose simply to give to the Senator some information in relation to the resolutions of the American Bar Association to which he has adverted. Not being a lawyer, I suppose the Senator has not followed the course of this legislation; but the resolutions of the bar association do not refer to this legislation at all. They refer to another bill, introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which if enacted into law would deprive the Federal courts of jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different States, and would deprive the Federal courts of jurisdiction over controversies by reason of the fact that there is involved in the controversy a Federal question.

Those are the facts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do I understand that this letter, then, does not apply at all to the legislation now before us?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not—not the resolutions of the bar association to which the letter referred to by the Senator makes reference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator may be in error in his statement that the resolutions of the Bar Association to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred have no reference to the bill now under consideration. The letter to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred shows that Senate bill 935, which is the anti-injunction bill, is one of the measures which the author of the communication inserted in the RECORD yesterday had in mind.

I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the best evidence as to what the authors of the resolution of the Bar Association had in mind is to be found in the resolution itself. It is stated—

> That the association authorize continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts or decreasing the power thereof.

That is the explanation which the authors of the resolution themselves gave in the resolution.

I respectfully suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that experience, not alone on the part of lawyers but on the part of others interested in litigation, has demonstrated the necessity for limiting or restricting the jurisdiction of Federal courts in certain instances, particularly including injunctions, for the reason that experience has proved that some inexplicable abuses have grown out of the unrestrained employment of that jurisdiction.

If the Senator from Montana will indulge me just a moment further, I shall say now what I had in mind saying at a later moment.

During the course of the debates in the Senate certain injunctions have been brought to the attention of the Senate. I recall that a comparatively short time ago one Federal judge signed an order, placing behind his order the power of the United States. When fairly construed that injunction order denied to you and to me and to every other person in the United States, whether parties to the proceeding or not, the right to administer to the sick, the right to supply food to the hungry, the right to give aid and assistance to the families of men who were engaged in the mining strike; and the abuse of the injunctive power in that one instance was sufficient to justify the Congress of the United States in taking its own view of the matter and restricting the jurisdiction, so that never again can any such action lawfully occur.

Another instance has been cited—I think it was cited by both the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]—the case of the musicians' strike, where a contract of musicians employed in the theaters of Chicago was expiring on Sunday, the day following, and a Federal judge enjoined them from going out of their employment. The equivalent of the order was to instruct them that notwithstanding they had neither a moral nor a civil obligation to continue in the employment they must do so, not by reason of any law attempted to be enacted by the authority of the people or their representatives but by reason of an order issued by a Federal judge.

In 1922, while the shopmen's strike was in progress, the Attorney General of the United States, who had recently recommended a judge for appointment, applied to that judge in the name of the Government for an injunction so sweeping in its terms, so comprehensive in its effects that it tended to paralyze the efforts of the workers who were out on strike. The judge in that case seemingly had the opinion that it was the province of the court to settle the strike, to determine the issues involved between the laborers and their employers. The terms of the injunction were oppressive—needlessly so. Anyone reading them would reach the conclusion that the judge and the Attorney General had decided that the strike ought to be terminated and that the power of the Government ought to be employed to end the strike.

They proceeded on the theory that the laborers were violating the law when they went out on strike, notwithstanding the fact that the Labor Board, as it was then constituted, had no power to enforce its decisions save through publicity, notwithstanding the fact that the employers in some instances had violated the decisions of the Labor Board, as the President of the United States himself said in a message to the Congress on the subject, and notwithstanding the further fact that the Congress had refused to adopt a provision giving the Labor Board the power to enforce its decisions. That provision was offered here. It was considered and finally rejected. The Congress stood upon the principle that there could be no compulsory determination of disputes of the class which were comprehended by the injunction in the case to which I am referring.

It is cases of this character which are not known to members of the bar association, as a rule, which call for legislation. There are comparatively few lawyers who, in the course of their practice, are engaged in the trial of lawsuits which bring to them definite knowledge of the procedure in injunction cases involving labor disputes.

Lawyers who had tried an injunction suit and won it, or lost it, in all probability reached the conclusion that Congress, which creates the courts and defines their jurisdiction in the first instance, ought never to change the jurisdiction after once it has been defined. But I submit to the Senate that any lawyer who studies the case of the musicians' strike, who studies the shop craft case, and who studies the case involving the strike of the miners in West Virginia and in other sections will reach the conclusion that the Congress is right in trying so to restrict and define the jurisdiction of the Federal courts that they can not exercise it to the destruction of the recognized rights of citizens.

The opinion of a bar association expressed in a resolution is influential always, but it is not and ought not to be controlling or conclusive, for the simple reason that generally comparatively few members of the association are familiar with the subject matter of resolutions, and oftentimes resolutions are proposed by those who have a very definite and specific object in suggesting them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was entirely correct in saying that the resolution does not refer to the pending bill, which I shall demonstrate directly. The letter refers to an entirely different bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with reference to the statement just made by the Senator from Montana, I read:

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
Vice President of the United States.
SIR: We have been advised that S. 935—

That is, the bill under consideration—will be up for consideration by the Senate on Tuesday, the 23d of this month. We feel that the position taken by the American Bar Association with reference to legislation of this character should be called to the attention of the Senate.

This position of the American Bar Association is evidenced by the formal action taken at its annual meeting at Memphis in 1929, and reported in volume 54 at page 93 of its annual report. This action consisted of the approval of the following resolution:

"That the association authorize continued opposition to all legislation radically limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts, or decreasing the power thereof."

The latter part of the matter printed in the RECORD has relation to other limitations proposed to be imposed on the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, but the portion I have read has relation to the bills like that now under consideration.

I thank the Senator from Montana for yielding to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was quite accurate in saying that the letter has no reference whatever to the pending bill. The pending bill is Senate bill 935 of the Seventy-second Congress. I have here what is said about the bill referred to:

Your committee recommends the defeat of Senate 2496, known as the Shipstead bill, limiting the jurisdiction of Federal courts sitting in equity or labor disputes, and fixing the public policy in relation thereto, on the ground that it is legislation—

And so forth.

That was a report made by a subcommittee of the American Bar Association, as will appear from the letter, in the year 1929. It had relation to Senate bill 2497, erroneously cited as Senate bill 2496, of the Seventy-first Congress, introduced by Mr. SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, which bill the Senate Judiciary Committee rejected, and for which it offered a substitute, as will appear from the minority and the majority reports, copies of which I have in my hand. The minority at that time offered a substitute, in substance quite like the bill before us—not identical with it, but quite like it—and then the Senator from Nebraska, during this Congress, presented the pending bill. That is radically different from the Shipstead bill, condemned by the report of the American Bar Association, which was a brief bill, reading as follows:

SEC. 28. Equity courts shall have jurisdiction to protect property against irreparable injury arising from definite destructive action, when there is no remedy at law; for the purpose of determining such jurisdiction the expression "remedy at law" shall be held to be any remedy, criminal or civil, provided by legislation, and nothing shall be held to be property unless it is exclusive, tangible, and transferable; and section 4 of the antitrust act of 1900, together with all amendments thereof, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith, are hereby repealed.

That is the Shipstead bill, which is referred to in a letter speaking of the action taken by the committee of the American Bar Association.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator take the position, then, that the chairman of the committee on jurisprudence and law reports of the American Bar Association in his letter dated February 20, 1932, advising the Vice President that the pending bill would be up for consideration, did not know what he was talking about when he said that the position taken by the American Bar Association in reference to legislation of this character should be called to the attention of the Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The facts are as I stated them. The inference necessarily is that the writer of the letter did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what I was trying to find out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Montana is entirely correct in his statement that the resolution of the bar association itself was adopted prior to the introduction of the pending bill and could not, of course, have direct application to it. But the author of the statement printed in the RECORD to which the Senator from Connecticut refers, namely, the letter dated February 20, 1932, quoted the resolution as applicable to the class of legislation, and sought to apply it to Senate bill 935 in the language I have read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to say that the judicial committee took exactly the same position taken by the American Bar Association, that the Shipstead bill should not be passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then it is the opinion of the Senator from Montana that the pending bill does not go contrary to the expressed wishes of the American Bar Association?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is that the American Bar Association has never expressed itself upon this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that at the meeting of the American Bar Association held at Atlantic City in September, 1931, the Shipstead bill, so called, was not referred to, but the reference was, "Your committee will continue its opposition to all legislation limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I have said, that has reference to the other bill introduced by the Senator from Nebraska, particularly limiting the jurisdiction of the United States courts, with reference to which I have had a great many letters protesting against it, chiefly from representatives of corporations, who are in the habit of transferring everything they can into the Federal courts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, since it is quite obvious that this bill is going to pass, I certainly am very glad to have the statement from one of the most distinguished members of the American Bar Association that their action did not refer to the bill before us.

I would like to ask one other question. I have received a letter, and I presume every other Senator has received a similar one, from the National Erectors' Association, 33 West Forty-second Street, New York City, protesting against the passage of this bill and calling attention to the fact that—

> Dr. Raymond Moley, professor of public law and jurisprudence at Columbia and a member of the New York State Commission on the Administration of Justice, gives the result of an investigation into rackets in the New York Times of August 9, 1931. After describing the "simple racket" he says: "The complex interrelations of labor, business, and politics in large cities, however, have made possible the development of vast elaborations of the same theme. These have technically been called collusive-agreement rackets. * * * The racket either in its simple form or development into the labyrinthian proportions of the collusive agreement takes its toll in nearly every field. At one time in one of our cities there were 163 rackets of the collusive-agreement character. This means that a large part of human endeavor in that city was and probably is carried on by and through illegal conspiracies."

In describing the collusive-agreement racket, Doctor Moley says:

> The dramatic unity of such associated activity presents four types of characters—business men, labor leaders, politicians, and professional criminals. Business men seek to create and maintain for themselves a favored position in their respective services or fields. Unscrupulous labor leaders seek a monopoly of control over the workmen engaged in a given trade by controlling the avenues of employment. The politicians participate in the action because they fill and control public offices that are concerned with the processes of business and trade. Serving at times all these interests are the unacknowledged but nevertheless real mercenaries—professional criminals, gunmen, muscle men—

And so forth.

The letter goes on to say:

> The more irresponsible and legally immune a labor union or other group becomes, the more attractive also it becomes as a vehicle for exploitation. The growth of the unions along right lines and the fulfilling of their high ideals will not be enhanced by measures which lessen their resposibilities as compared with those of other citizens.

I have heard a good deal said about the so-called "yellow-dog" contract, and I should be very glad to vote for anything which would make that form of slavery or human servitude impossible in our country. But, with reference to the bill before us, I have been told by distinguished members of the bar in the city of Washington that it does limit Federal courts in a dangerous manner.

We are informed by the counsel of the National Erectors' Association, Mr. Walter Drew, that the collusive agreement is a conspiracy between a group of employers and a labor union whereby the monopoly of the union in a particular trade is used to protect both the union and the employer group from outside competition, with the result that the two groups enjoy joint monopolies in the trade and territory covered by the agreement.

It is obviously the idea of the counsel representing the National Erectors' Association that this legislation will lead to something which would not promote legal harmony but might promote that kind of collusive agreement.

Has the Senator from Montana given attention to that matter?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, is the professor to whom the Senator referred a professor at Columbia?

Mr. BINGHAM. The professor quoted in the letter, Dr. Raymond Moley, professor of public law and jurisprudence at Columbia, was describing the form of collusive-agreement racket, which the author of this letter, with whom I am not acquainted—and I am asking for information—says is the kind of agreement racket that would be promoted if this legislation were enacted. I am sure the Senator must disagree with him or he would not be in favor of the legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to say in that connection that the legislation has been pending here, as my recollection serves me, for about four years. Very extensive hearings have been had, and everyone who wanted to be heard upon the matter and who could be in any wise helpful was invited to come before the committee. I do not remember that the distinguished gentleman who now criticizes the bill came before the committee to help us draft it and to insert the necessary safeguards against the practices to which he adverts. I must say to the Senator from Connecticut, notwithstanding the elaborate hearings, the question of the opportunity to enter into collusive arrangements under the bill was not so forcibly presented at least as that it made any impression upon my mind, and I do not recall that any of the witnesses indicated any such dire results from the legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. I suppose the letter was sent to all Senators.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Possibly it was sent to Senators within the last day or two while the discussion was in progress, but, of course, the matter ought to have the very careful consideration of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there anything in the bill which would restrict or prevent the sort of collusive-agreement racket that is referred to in the letter?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say not. I should say that would have to be taken care of by some other statute. Indeed, I should think enterprises of that character would be condemned by penal law and not unlikely by the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I have now in my hand the bill to which the first part of the resolution of the bar association refers. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the second day of the present Congress, being S. 939, and entitled "A bill to limit the jurisdiction of district courts of the United States." That was the bill with reference to which the American Bar Association expressed its objection first, and, second, to the Shipstead bill which I read a few moments ago.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then it is the Senator's opinion that when in this letter reference is made to S. 935, the writer of the letter confuses it with S. 939?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; by no means. The letter refers to the pending consideration of S. 935, but the writer confuses that bill with S. 2497 of the Seventy-first Congress. He does not assume, but it might easily be assumed, that the two are identical, whereas as a matter of fact they are radically different. The Committee on the Judiciary rejected S. 2497 just as the bar association did.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is most unfortunate from the point of view of the layman that this letter from the bar association should be inserted in the RECORD so late and should be of such a nature that the Senator from Montana is able to claim that it does not refer to the legislation now before us. I ask that the letter of Mr. Drew may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ERECTORS' ASSOCIATION,
New York City, February 27, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of the National Erectors' Association, whose members fabricate a very large percentage of the structural iron and steel used in the United States and whose products enter largely into the channels of interstate trade, I desire to protest against the enactment of the Norris anti-injunction bill into law.

This is class legislation in favor of a militant, strongly organized group which already enjoys a large measure of legal privilege and immunity. This condition of privilege and immunity under the present legal situation has largely contributed to the growth of certain conditions and tendencies which constitute a distinct menace to our national economic life. The proposed legislation would stimulate and aggravate these conditions and tendencies and would be a direct invitation to their extension to the channels of interstate trade and commerce. I refer specifically to the collusive agreement and the racket.

The collusive agreement is a conspiracy between a group of employers and a labor union whereby the monopoly of the union in a particular trade is used to protect both the union and the employer group from outside competition, with the result that the two groups enjoy a joint monopoly in the trade and territory covered by the agreement. Local political affiliations are used to strengthen the combination so that it becomes practically immune from attack. The Lockwood investigation in New York City disclosed that nearly all of the building trades of the city were controlled by these collusive combinations, and investigations in many other cities have revealed similar conditions. Due to the restrictions of Federal law, these combinations are now largely local. If those restrictions were removed or weakened, there would be an undoubted extension of the field now covered by such agreements to the products and materials carried in interstate commerce.

The chief strength of the unions is found in the building trades, and it is fair to assume that the conditions brought about by union control in this field are typical of conditions that would become general if such control were extended. The exorbitant and burdensome cost of construction which is so general in our large cities is due largely to these collusive combinations and to the restrictions, profiteering, and corruption which has grown up under them. Can anyone say that any measure which will tend to establish these conditions more firmly or to extend them to different fields of industry is in the public interest?

Dr. Raymond Moley, professor of public law and jurisprudence at Columbia and a member of the New York State Commission on the Administration of Justice, gives the result of an investigation into rackets in the New York Times of August 9, 1931. After describing the "simple racket" he says, "The complex interrelations of labor, business, and politics in large cities, however, have made possible the development of vast elaborations of the same theme. These have technically been called collusive-agreement rackets * * *. The racket, either in its simple form or development into the labyrinthian proportions of the collusive agreement, takes its toll in nearly every field. At one time in one of our cities there were 163 rackets of the collusive-agreement character. This means that a large part of human endeavor in that city was, and probably is, carried on by and through illegal conspiracies." In describing the collusive-agreement racket, Doctor Moley says, "The dramatic unity of such associated activity presents four types of characters: Business men, labor leaders, politicians, and professional criminals. Business men seek to create and maintain for themselves a favored position in their respective services or fields. Unscrupulous labor leaders seek a monopoly of control over the workmen engaged in a given trade by controlling the avenues of employment. The politicians participate in the action because they fill and control public offices that are concerned with the processes of business and trade. Serving at times all these interests are the unacknowledged but nevertheless real mercenaries, professional criminals, gunmen, muscle men, 'gorillas,' and 'sab cats.'"

The more irresponsible and legally immune a labor union or other group becomes, the more attractive also it becomes as a vehicle for exploitation. The growth of the unions along right lines and the fulfilling of their high ideals will not be enhanced by measures which lessen their responsibilities as compared with those of other citizens.

Respectfully,

WALTER DREW, Counsel.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have received a great number of letters in protest against the legislation, and I find that the writers of the letters are identifying this bill with legislation proposed in the last Congress. They evidently do not know the number of the pending bill but are following largely the suggestion of the bar association which has to do with legislation of the preceding session. My mail is quite abundant on the same subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I inquire whether this confounding of legislation and ignorance of it emanates from distinguished lawyers?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio is not capable of determining that fact.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has submitted one layman's perplexity and I want to submit another. I refer to the constitutionality of section 11 and its unlimited provision for the right of trial by jury in all contempt proceedings. I would not, as a layman, presume even to submit the inquiry to the Senate if it were not for the fact that I am directly related to section 12 of the pending bill. Section 12 is precisely similar to independent legislation which I have repeatedly introduced for the last four years respecting proceedings in contempt with particular reference to the freedom of the press. In other words, sections 11 and 12 bear jointly upon the same phase of the problem.

This issue in respect to the press arose acutely in the so-called Ohio case in 1929. Immediately, as a result of obvious, indefensible judicial tyranny which was suffered at that point and in that instance, there was a general movement among the newspapers of the United States to inquire into the possibility of curbing this type of tyranny in which a judge, in a State jurisdiction, acted as complainant, prosecuting witness, and ultimate arbiter in an indirect contempt which related solely to his own conduct.

I should like to digress long enough to say that I think one of the great advantages of the pending legislation relates to the contribution which one section of it is proposing to make to the essential freedom of the press, as well as the legitimate freedom of labor contracts. It may, in this respect, offer a useful example for emulation in State legislation.

In the course of the inquiry to which I referred, I came to the inevitable conclusion—based, of course, not upon my own findings but upon the best available legal advice which I could procure—that a provision for the rotation of judges as originally proposed in my bill S. 1726 in 1929, and as now provided in section 12 of the pending measure was the utmost safe limit to which legislation could undertake to go within constitutional scope, with the exception of the so-called criminal provision which is in the Clayton Act. Furthermore, it seems to me that this rotation of judges is ample protection against abuse, with such added right of limited trial by jury as is set up in the Clayton Act. It is my understanding that the provision in the Clayton Act which provides for trial by jury in contempt cases is confined to the following specifications:

> If the act or thing done be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or under the laws of any State in which it was committed.

In other words, the provision for trial by jury in contempt in the Clayton Act applies solely at the point where the contempt is of itself a violation of a State or Federal law. The legitimacy of trial by jury under such circumstances seems obvious. It is my understanding that this provision which bears directly upon the question which I am now submitting to the Senate was taken into the courts for construction in the so-called Michaelson case. I believe that the United States district court concluded, as reported in Two hundred and seventy-fourth Federal Reporter, 604, that even this limited provision for trial by jury is unconstitutional; that this adverse finding was concurred in by the United States circuit court as reported in Two hundred and ninety-first Federal Reporter, 945; but that this finding was reversed in the Supreme Court in a ruling in Two hundred and sixty-sixth United States Reports, 65, on the distinct and specific ground that it was a circumscribed and very limited application of the principle of trial by jury in a contempt proceeding. The reversal, however, was in effect a severe warning.

Mr. President, I would not, of course, undertake to submit a legal conclusion to the Senate upon this score——

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in just a moment. But I am bound to say, based upon my rather lengthy study which preceded the original preparation of the language which now appears in section 12 of the bill before us, that I was driven to the conclusion that a general and broad provision for trial by jury in all contempt proceedings of this nature would invade the inherent powers of the courts and unquestionably would fall under the ban of the Constitution.

I yield now to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the Senator's objection is that it would be unconstitutional to provide that a man who has been guilty of a contempt should have a trial by jury. I understand the Senator's objection is that it is unconstitutional?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am undertaking to state that I have been advised that an unlimited extension of the privilege would be a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not the Senator's personal opinion, is it, that a man charged with contempt is not entitled to trial by jury?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I am not discussing that question at all. On the contrary, I am saying that my fear would be that section 11 might fail ultimately to provide any relief, however appropriate, through trial by jury because of the effort of the section to make it an unlimited right of trial by jury, which is at the very least highly doubtful as a constitutional proposition. The question I am submitting, therefore, in its practical phase is whether or not the right of trial by jury as defined in section 11 would not more advisedly be defined and limited as it is in the language of the Clayton Act, which already has been construed by the Supreme Court and supported by the Supreme Court. We can not leap the bounds of the Constitution. Judge Baker used a very happy figure of speech in his decision in the Michaelson case when he said that Congress is the potter which shapes the vase, but when it is shaped the judicial power is poured into it by the Constitution and not by Congress. The final decision in respect to this particular point will be made by the Supreme Court and not by us, and of course I am content to leave the law to this final adjudication. I only submit the question for its contemporary bearing on our legislative viewpoint.

Mr. LOGAN. I am frank to confess that I have not had that view of the matter suggested by the Senator. If there is any objection that I have to the bill now being discussed, it is to the fact that it allows a judge to inflict, without a trial by jury, any punishment more than is necessary to protect the orderly procedure of the court. I am opposed to any judge inflicting punishment except so far as may be necessary to enable him to conduct the affairs of his court. We have had such a law in our State for 100 years or more, I believe. No judge down there may inflict punishment for contempt except a direct contempt, and then he is limited to the imposing of a few hours' imprisonment and a small fine. If he wants the punishment to go beyond that he must impanel a jury. The law has never been attacked that I know of, either in the Federal or State courts.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am discussing the constitutional phase of the Federal question as it impends, as I see it, in section 11, and as it has been attacked and adjudicated. I am doing so solely, of course, upon accumulated testimony and evidence as it came to me in connection with my study of the same problem in section 12.

The State of Illinois in July, 1931, enacted in its State jurisdiction precisely the same type of contempt law which is defined in section 12 to which I have referred.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in just a moment. I find in the Chicago Tribune at that contemporary period the observations of Mr. Henry Barrett Chamberlain, operating director for the Chicago Crime Commission, who as a constitutional attorney raised the question as to whether even a provision for the rotation of judges could qualify as a constitutional proposition. If there be any doubt about the constitutionality of the rotation of judges, there is, of course, multiplied doubt of grave degree respecting the constitutionality of universal jury trials in contempt proceedings. So in connection with my study of the newspaper phase of the question I am constantly prompted to raise the question whether or not section 11 in its unlimited grant of the right of jury trial can justify itself under the Constitution.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I just want to suggest to the Senator, with his permission, that he has narrowed and limited the law as defined in the Michaelson case. That case not only holds that jury trial is permissible when there is contempt that also consists of a violation of the statute but is also permissible whenever the contempt is of a criminal nature, whenever it is criminal contempt, quite without respect to whether or not there is any law punishing the particular thing for which the contempt proceeding is instituted.

So the decision in the Michaelson case is much broader and is much wider; in fact, it implies and holds as well that criminal contempt is to all intents and purposes criminal, and therefore the parties so charged would be entitled to jury trial unless there is absence of procedure permitting the jury trial. In the case of the Clayton Act it extended only to certain contempts; that is, contempts which were also of the character of criminal acts under the statute; but under the Michaelson case the legislative power is extended far beyond that, and I should be glad to read that portion of the opinion, if the Senator desires.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. Of course, I would not undertake to discuss the Michaelson case with the Senator from Wisconsin in its technical phases. As I have read it, it refers particularly to the limited power in the Clayton Act, and adds this significant language:

> If the reach of the statute had extended to the cases which are excluded, a different and more serious question would arise.

It is this different and more serious question which I now raise for whatever it may be worth.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, let me say that the court in that expression had in mind what is popularly known as civil contempt. If the Senator will read the very next sentence or two, following what he has read, he will find the court stating:

> In criminal contempts, as in criminal cases, the presumption of innocence obtains. Proof of guilt must be beyond reasonable doubt and the defendant may not be compelled to be a witness against himself.

And then on the next page the opinion discusses the same subject at somewhat greater length, but the only question the court raises is with respect to what are known as civil contempts, and upon that question the court does not pass in the Michaelson case.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Michigan has suggested a point which is perhaps the most serious one in connection with this whole matter before the Senate. I should like to suggest to the Senator, as to the power of the legislature to limit the jurisdiction of equity courts, that for many years it was held by leading lawyers that it was beyond the power of the legislature; that is, the legislative department of the Government could not limit the jurisdiction of an equity court after that jurisdiction had been conferred; that jurisdiction might be entirely withheld, but if it was conferred it could not be limited, and the court could exercise its equity jurisdiction in accordance with the old common-law rule.

If that holding is to be followed by our courts in this day, if the Supreme Court should follow that doctrine, this bill, should it become law, will be declared unconstitutional. My impression, however, is—and it is a very definite impression—that for the past 20 years or longer the courts have been getting away from that interpretation of the law, and the weight of authority now is, and the more respectable authority will be found to hold, that if the legislature has the power in the first place to grant the jurisdiction, and if it has the power to take it away, it may limit the jurisdiction which it has conferred. That must be the position of those who advocate the passage of this bill, that Congress having in the first place conferred upon the Federal courts the equity jurisdiction it may take it away entirely; and, if it has the right to take it away entirely, it has the right to limit it. So I think the Senator, although he proclaims himself to be a layman, has raised probably the real question that will ultimately be considered in regard to this proposed legislation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not desire to argue the constitutional point further. It seems to me that the measure should not go to a vote without this particular and paramount question having been raised regarding this one section for whatever comment it deserves to invite. So far as I am personally concerned, I should very much prefer that section 11 should be limited in some rational aspects similar to the limitation in the Clayton Act. But if it remains as written—and I may as well make this statement now as later—if it remains as written, much as I should regret to vote for any section which I believed to be unconstitutional in a bill, I would be still more reluctant because of the presence of the doubtful section, to vote against the bill as a whole with a dozen other sections which I favor. However, the point, it seems to me, for the sake of the record, should be the subject of a somewhat conclusive statement on behalf of the proponents of the bill. In the final analysis, of course, the Supreme Court will speak for itself and with undebatable conclusiveness respecting the particular section which I have discussed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 10, it is proposed to insert the word "tangible" before the word "property," and on page 7, line 2, to insert the word "tangible" before the word "property."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I shall not impose myself upon the Senate except for a very short time. The debate has demonstrated that there seems to be a unanimous opinion in the Senate that abuses in the use of the injunctive power by courts of equity have become so flagrant that legislative relief is called for. There also seems to be a unanimous opinion in the Senate that the "yellow-dog" contract is an unconscionable contract and ought to be outlawed. As a result, in this bill there is provision made for the outlawing of the "yellow-dog" contract by stigmatizing it as an outlaw. Then the question will go to the Supreme Court for that court to determine whether or not the outlawing of that kind of a contract is an interference with the constitutional right of freedom of contract. Certainly it has been very plain that the Senate is anxious to enact legislation that will prove effective to eliminate the abuses that have been complained of.

These abuses have been enumerated by so many eminent men that I am not going to take any time of the Senate to repeat them or to enumerate other abuses that may not have been mentioned. I believe the subcommittee of the Senate which has had this proposed legislation in charge for the last two or three years is entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the conscientious and energetic work they have performed in considering the great mass of testimony which has been presented in preparing this bill for the consideration of the Senate.

I believe that those members of the committee who have expressed themselves as being opposed to certain provisions of the bill have conducted themselves in a dignified way and in a manner that can certainly not be criticized even by the friends of the bill. I hope that no one will consider me presumptuous if, as a layman, I call to the attention of the Senate some aspects in which possibly the bill may be made even more effective than those who are now its friends hope that it may be.

In this bill we find enumerated a list of prohibitions directed to courts of equity; a certain number of things are set forth which they shall not do in the matter of issuing injunctions, until we come down to line 5, on page 6. There we find what in the history of injunctions in the past has proved, and I am afraid in the future will prove, the most significant words in the American system of law so far as labor disputes are concerned. These words I will quote. They appear in the bill following the listed prohibitions and are to this effect:

Except after findings of fact by the court to the effect.

In those words we find the root to the evil of labor injunctions when we study their history. On these words we find that all the prohibitions enumerated in this bill are founded. If the court finds certain things to be so, the prohibitions do not remain prohibitions, and he is allowed to issue injunctions under the law. The guide to the finding of facts is left to the conscience of the judge sitting in a court of equity, and there is where it always has resided. That has always been the guide to the findings of fact in the issuing of injunctions.

In the old chancery court of England the chancery judge was the keeper of the King's conscience. Under our system the judge sitting on the bench is the keeper of his own conscience merely, or, as is sometimes believed, the keeper of the conscience of the corporation which asks for the injunction. Judges of equity courts seem too often to be keepers of the conscience of the corporations which are influential in placing and keeping them upon the bench. As a result, we have discovered by bitter experience that the court finds what it thinks he ought to find, such as that the complainant has no adequate remedy at law, and that substantial and irreparable injury to complainant's property will follow; that unlawful acts will be committed, and that public officers charged with the duty to protect the complainant's property are unable or unwilling to furnish adequate protection.

To an humble layman who believes in government by law instead of government by injunction, it would appear that if the local officers, the police officers, the peace officers can not or will not protect the complainant's property, the complainant has a remedy in law by appealing to the governor of the State for the protection of the militia. This is a remedy at law furnished by the Government. It is the remedy with which the ordinary citizen is expected to be satisfied, and, being the remedy furnished for the ordinary citizen, it ought to be a sufficient remedy for corporations.

As to subsection (d) of section 7, when the court finds that the complainant has no adequate remedy at law the findings of the court in these disputes are usually based upon a strained conception of what constitutes an adequate remedy. The ordinary citizen finds that he is expected to be satisfied with a remedy furnished at law when the legislative body has defined the crime and prescribed the penalty for the violation of the law.

Thus, the legislative body has made it a criminal act for anyone to burn my house, and prescribed the penalty of imprisonment for the person who burns it. This may not save my house, but I must accept the remedy at law. I may make complaint that the remedy is not adequate because it does not prevent the burning of the house; but it is the remedy furnished at law, and I must accept it.

In all this debate in the Senate I think there has been overemphasis on the preventive effectiveness of injunctions so far as they are intended to protect physical property. In the railroad strike of 1894, Judge Wood, of the Federal court in Chicago, issued an injunction against railroad workers who were on strike. No rioting occurred, and no destruction of property occurred, until after the injunction had been issued. Mr. Debs was not arrested until after the rioting had ceased and after the strike had subsided; and he was arrested under the criminal statutes of the State a week before he was arrested for violating the court order of Judge Wood. I believe the history of injunctions in labor disputes shows that they have not been effective for the prevention of crime, and as a matter of fact it is very doubtful if that has been the purpose of these injunctions.

If a person makes a threat of destroying my property, if he threatens personal injury to me or my property, I can have him bound to keep the peace and furnish bond. This is the remedy at law. It developed in the debate yesterday about this bridge that we have heard so much about in the debate in the last few days that everyone in the whole country seems to have been so concerned about, on the ground that the owner would have no remedy at law, that he would not have his bridge protected unless he had the right to secure injunctions against union labor men—it developed in the debate yesterday that he did have a remedy, and he did have sources of protection for his bridge without resort to an injunction.

As a matter of fact, the complainant in most cases does not have any fear of damage to his plant or other property. What he wants is to stop the legitimate activities of laborers in concert, so that the corporation can deal with them as individuals. To accomplish this the corporation uses a judge who very often owes his position on the bench to the influence of the corporation whose agents ask him for injunctive relief.

In subsection (a) the court finds that unlawful acts have been committed and will be continued. If unlawful acts have been committed we again have a remedy at law if the legislative body has furnished one—and it usually has. Certainly it is not necessary for me to enumerate the remedies at law for unlawful acts.

I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska about subsection (a) in paragraph 7. Do the Senator and the committee consider that that is confined to injunctions that may be issued in relation to labor disputes only? It is not a general provision, is it? In fact, all of the provisions of this bill are confined to labor disputes, are they not, if I may ask the Senator the question?

Mr. NORRIS. Not all of them, Mr. President. There are some general provisions. For instance, section 11 as now amended is general and applies to everything. Section 12 is general. Those are all that I think of at present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator. That is what I wanted to know.

I should like to ask another question, if I may; and that is, what unlawful acts might be involved here—any unlawful act that might occur in the vicinity where the controversy was taking place?

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator propounding that question to me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should say not. It would be some unlawful act connected with the dispute or the controversy that was there. I can not assume that any court would take any other view of the matter. There might be an unlawful act there that was entirely separate from and had no connection whatever with the labor difficulty.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

I venture to repeat, because I think it is worthy of repetition, a paragraph from a statement of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] the other day, when he said:

> The equity jurisdiction of the later English courts was a mere offshoot of the Roman system prevailing in the time of the Cæsars. This was a writ wholly and only for the purpose of exercising a prerogative of the sovereign of nations, a power assumed and exercised to prevent invasion, intrusion, or any form of usurpation of royal prerogative in matters of government. There never was an assumption in the adoption of the theory of injunction that it should apply to individual conduct and to persons. That exercise of authority has grown upon the courts of this country in the growth of complete usurpation. Yet the tendency continued and multiplied until there was a general assent to allow this innovation upon the theory that the circumstances surrounding each offense justified the departure to avoid violence.

In the words of the distinguished Senator from Illinois—and I want to thank him for calling that matter to the attention of the Senate, because I think the historical aspect of this subject should never be out of the minds of men dealing with it—it is true that it is an offshoot of the Roman system of law. That was a system of law designed to make it possible for 10 per cent of the people who were free, who owned all the wealth and also the other 90 per cent of the population as slaves, to live in perfect comfort and safety under the social and political conditions existing at that time. In other words, that system of law was conceived and developed to protect the masters from the slaves. The Romans gave it to the Franks and the Germans, and this system was carried to England by the Normans, where the system became so obnoxious that Englishmen had to cut off the heads of several hundred judges in order to compel those remaining on the bench to have some respect for Anglo-Saxon law. In order to restore respect for the courts, and to establish justice, it was necessary to kill many of the judges.

This system of law, conceived in the political, social, and economic conception of the rulers of ancient Rome, was checked and modified in England only after the spilling of much human blood, then transferred to the United States, and began in the early nineties to show signs of reverting to the ugly characteristics of its birth in the slave period of Rome. When the creation and growth of corporation powers started in the United States, with their increasing influence, this system of law was gradually increased and extended until its ugly tentacles spread over the land, displacing government by law with government by equity, doing away with trial by jury, ignoring or setting aside legislative remedies and constitutional guaranties. The creature of a people's government became so powerful as to threaten the very life of its creator. Its main source of sustenance has been the "due process of law" clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, the provisions of which amendment have been so perverted that in the name of due process of law to protect property they have in many cases destroyed the guaranties of liberty and life found in the same amendment.

This perversion has been made possible by the system's own extended definition of property. Under this strained definition of property, equity jurisdiction has been extended so that courts of equity now issue injunctions in labor disputes not only when there is no remedy at law but where there is a remedy at law, and apparently on the assumption that the remedy furnished by a court of equity is more complete and therefore a better remedy than that furnished at law. They prefer the autocratic Roman system of administration of law to the Anglo-Saxon system of statute law and trial by jury. As a result injunctions have historically been issued in these cases principally to prevent irreparable injury to intangible property.

The so-called property rights involved in most labor injunction cases are not the tangible property of the employer, but the claimed intangible property rights which arise from relationships established with employers and employees, interference with which affects the marketing of the products of labor.

Economists call these rights "market opportunities." These rights are really personal rights, and not property; and it is only by treating them as property that injunctions can be issued in most labor cases.

Certainly it is not necessary to enlighten the Senate on this subject, but for the purpose of the record, to illustrate what I mean by that statement, I will call attention to what was called the Wonderland Theater case, in Minneapolis, some years ago, where the manager of the theater refused to hire union labor in the operation of his theater. The Labor Review and members of labor unions published in the paper the fact that the manager of the Wonderland Theater refused to hire union labor. Pamphlets were also printed and spread throughout the city calling the attention of whoever might read the pamphlets to the fact that a labor controversy was on, and that the manager of the Wonderland Theater did not employ union labor.

The manager of the theater applied to the court for an injunction, claiming that his property was taken away from him; that he was deprived of his property without due process of law. The court held that he had an intangible property right in the patronage of the public, and that, in effect, the result of advertising the facts connected with the strike was to deprive him and his theater of the patronage of the public; and to the extent that he was deprived of that patronage, to that extent he claimed he was deprived of property without due process of law.

The editor of the Labor Review and other labor men refused to obey the injunction that the court issued on the ground that patronage of the public was a personal right merely and not a property right. They were sentenced to jail for a period of three months for publishing what no one denied were the facts about this controversy. They went to jail because the court held it to be the property right of the theater to do business with the public and to accept their patronage; that that was property.

In order to protect that personal right, which the court determined was property, they had to violate other provisions of the Constitution and deprive other citizens of personal rights, to freedom of the press, to freedom peacefully to assemble, and so forth.

While that was in a State court, I simply point to it as showing what has taken place and what usually takes place in labor controversies because of the fact that what up until 30 or 40 years ago was not considered to be property within the provisions of the equity power has so been changed by the courts in the matter of procedure that they now call practically any human activity property they see fit to call property for the purpose of finding an excuse for limiting the lawful activities of human beings, on the ground that they have a right to do so under the excuse of protecting property, and in order to accomplish the purpose they have to call things property that are not property in themselves.

Criticism of injunctions on this ground was first developed by Governor Altgeld, of Illinois, and in the early nineties by eminent writers in journals of law. The Pearre anti-injunction bill of the Roosevelt period was based upon this theory, and labor opposition to the Clayton bill in 1914 in its original form was based upon this principle. In the Clayton Act there was inserted the provision " the labor of a human being is not a commodity." This provision was inserted in the act to prevent the courts from holding that the labor of the human being is a commodity or article of commerce. Of course, this provision of the Clayton Act, intended to invoke the prohibitions against involuntary servitude of the thirteenth amendment, became meaningless under this old but, in America, comparatively new and growing system of law.

Mr. Thomas S. Spelling, who, since the early nineties and during the early nineteen hundreds, was quoted more than any other American writer by eminent men as an authority on equity, always held this view. The conception of what constitutes property has undergone such great changes in the last half century that if it had not been for this change labor injunctions would very likely never have been heard of.

There is a well-grounded difference of opinion as to whether, for the purpose of legislation, the definition of property is legislative or judicial prerogative. This amendment does not trespass upon the grounds of that controversy. This amendment would limit injunctive relief during labor disputes to tangible property only, leaving the vast field of intangible personal rights to remedies at law.

This amendment is in harmony with the bill now before the Senate because that bill is a bill limiting jurisdiction of courts of equity in labor disputes. The necessity to eradicate the abuses of the power of injunctions in these cases is conceded by those who favor the bill and those who are opposed to it. The prohibitions enumerated prior to section 7 are merely a restatement of what is already considered the best equity practice; that is, with the exception of reference to the " yellow-dog " contract. The enforcement of these prohibitions will depend upon the administration by the court of the principle involved in the words " except for the finding of fact by the court to the effect," and so forth. That is where they have rested in the past, and without this amendment they will there remain without limitation. This has been the source of abuses we are endeavoring to eliminate. I fear that without the adoption of this amendment we leave the source of the evil untouched, and therefore untouched the evil itself.

If I may take just a few moments, I want to call attention to a decision of the Supreme Court handed down last spring, which I think ought to guide courts in labor disputes as well as others where the liberties of human beings who labor are at stake. I would like to see all courts, inferior as well as the Supreme Court, apply that rule of law in deciding questions of jurisdiction and power, and the use of the equity power decided in a case brought under the so-called Minnesota newspaper " gag " law, decided last spring.

The case came to the court as the result of legislative enactment by the Legislature of Minnesota. The law provided that criminal libel could be enjoined by a court of equity, and under that provision of the Minnesota law two editors were permanently enjoined from publishing their papers on the ground that they were a public nuisance.

The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, which held the law unconstitutional. The court said that the injured party in a case of criminal libel had a remedy at law under the criminal libel statutes of the State, and, having a remedy at law furnished by the State, the use of a court of equity to take jurisdiction was uncalled for and was a violation of constitutional guaranties of freedom of the press.

Upon the passage of the Minnesota act and its enforcement every large corporation owning a newspaper in the United States immediately saw that its property and its rights were endangered, and they raised money to carry the case to which I have referred to the Supreme Court, and there the law was held unconstitutional. I think the court decided correctly that there was a remedy at law; and where there is a remedy at law, a court of equity should never have jurisdiction.

In most of these controversies complained of, where the protection of property is involved, where there is a question of trespass, injunctions have been issued on the ground that there is trespass. If there is a remedy in the courts of law for criminal libel, there is a remedy for trespass to the injured party. But when we come to labor disputes, we find that the courts issue injunctions in cases of trespass, setting aside the laws of the State. There seems to be one rule for labor and another for capital.

It is against this continuous, progressive encroachment of courts of equity upon courts of law, the displacement of the Anglo-Saxon system of law by the Roman system of law, against which I protest, and I want to go on record as protesting against it.

Mr. President, I would like to have a record vote on this amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is an unpleasant task for me to oppose this amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, who, as a matter of fact, has given a great deal of time and attention to this question for quite a number of years.

There are two schools of thought. One believes that the right way to proceed in order to prevent the harm which has come and is continually coming from the granting of such injunctions as have been discussed is to define property. The people who believe in that way may be right. I have a great deal of sympathy with their theory. But the matter came before the Committee on the Judiciary something over two or three years ago, when the Senator from Minnesota offered his bill relating to the granting of injunctions, which was only half as long as one's finger, which was intended to correct the evils of injunctions mainly by a definition of property.

The pending amendment carries out that theory. But the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senator from Minnesota, devoted to it a great deal of time, a great deal of thought, and a great deal of attention, and sought much legal advice, because they were impressed with the fact that it was backed by the Senator from Minnesota, and we knew his earnestness, and that back of him was one man whom most Members of the Senate have learned to know and to love for the years he has been here as a representative of the organization of seamen, Mr. Furuseth. He believes in what was advocated by the Senator from Minnesota. But after the subcommittee had given the attention to which I have referred, and had sought that advice, it reached the conclusion that the method proposed was not the best way for curing the injunctive evil. I myself was in great sympathy with what had been proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, but as nearly as we could gather from our research, the lawyers who had studied the subject were practically unanimous against it. Anyway, the committee decided to build up a bill instead of the one offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and did so. That has been modified and changed and has come down to us now through several Congresses and is the bill now before us, drawn along entirely different lines. Right or wrong, we took that course. We have done the best we could.

The subcommittee which drafted the bill had a little conference in regard to the amendment. I did not know until yesterday anything about it being offered. We are afraid of it because it is engrafting onto this bill practically a fundamental principle which would be perfectly applicable if we had taken the other horn of the dilemma. We do not believe it safe thus to limit property as the amendment would do.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator think that the adoption of the amendment would endanger the validity of the entire measure?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe it would result in the entire measure being declared unconstitutional, but I think it would result in some very necessary parts of it, perhaps, being so held. At least it is based on a different theory entirely from that upon which the bill is constructed, and we do not believe it is wisdom to take part of one theory and part of the other.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In view of what the Senator said a moment ago, may I express the hope that the Senator does not feel that anything I said to-day or anything I may have said heretofore would indicate that I am in any way dissatisfied with the committee or question the sincerity or earnestness of purpose of the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I have no such thought. I think, while the Senator did not get out of the committee what he wanted, he has been perfectly satisfied that the committee did what they thought was the best thing to do. I am speaking now not only for myself but for the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and also for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] who have been on the subcommittee with me from the very beginning. The amendment comes before us now without any notice. While I realize that it is offered in the best of good faith and in the belief that it would improve the bill, yet we are afraid it would not do so, and, therefore, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote on the pending amendment, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLENN. I have a general pair for the day with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. Understanding that if present he would vote as I intend to vote, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I have voted on this question. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] are absent on official business.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]; and

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—6

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 11, lines 19, 20, and 21, I move to strike out the words "or any controversy arising out of the respective interests of employer and employee."

It has been felt by the friends of the bill that by reason of provisions in section 6 and the provisions referred to in the amendment in the definition of labor disputes, there might possibly arise some embarrassment in the prosecution of actions for personal injury or death resulting as the consequence of an accident. It is for the purpose of obviating any such difficulty that the amendment is offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 19, after the word "employment," strike out the words "or concerning employment relations, or any other controversy arising out of the respective interests of employer and employee," so as to make the subsection read:

(c) The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether or not the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to add a new paragraph to section 8, to read as follows:

(b) If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person directly or indirectly employed by him in connection with industrial relations has incited, promoted, or encouraged the labor dispute giving rise to the proceedings or any unlawful acts in connection therewith, all proceedings hereunder shall be suspended and any restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative until a hearing and determination has been had to determine the facts with respect to such allegations, and the court shall thereupon require that issue be joined and that a hearing thereon shall be immediately held.

Testimony relating to such issue shall be taken in the same manner as is taken in equity proceedings within the jurisdiction of said court.

After the taking of such testimony, if the court finds against the complainant on the issue joined, the court shall make a finding of fact and shall assess against the complainant, and the defendants shall recover threefold, the loss, expense, and damage caused by the issuance of such restraining order or temporary injunction, together with all reasonable costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee, incurred in the action instituted by complainants, and where there is more than one defendant, the amount assessed and recovered shall be apportioned among the defendants according to their respective interests as may be shown in said proceeding, and any restraining order or temporary injunction issued in the action instituted by complainants shall be dissolved, as a part of the judgment for damages and costs on the special issue joined.

A review of such findings and the judgment rendered in such matter may be had in the same manner as is now provided for a review in equity proceedings of which said court has jurisdiction.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, on yesterday I submitted the proposal so that the amendment might be printed and Members of the Senate might have an opportunity to read it. While the amendment appears to be long, it is very simple. The length of the amendment is due to the necessity of setting up the necessary procedure to accomplish the main purpose designed.

It will be recalled that in the Indianapolis Street Railway Co. strike the employees had been struggling for 10 years in the effort to obtain a decent wage. Finally organizers came from Detroit, that city being the headquarters of the general organization of street railway employees. After some days had elapsed the employees finally thought that they were strong enough successfully to carry on a strike, and on June 2, 1926, Judge Baltzell, on the request of the attorneys for the street railway company, issued an injunction against a probable strike.

It was ascertained after that injunction was issued that a man by the name of Boggs, an employee of the street railway company, had wormed himself into the organization and had himself elected president of the local employees' organization. Two other men, by the names, respectively, of Thompson and Young, who were likewise employees of the street railway company, also wormed themselves into the organization. Boggs and Thompson and Young were all spies; they were all agents of the company. When the street railway employees met on the night of July 2 to determine whether or not they should strike, and when the organizers read the injunction to those men, advised them that they had the facts before them, and urged them that they could not strike without disobeying the injunction, Boggs, the company detective, the agent of the street railway company, made an inflammatory address and lashed the workingmen into voting a strike. As a result thereof the contempt proceedings developed.

This amendment provides that where such a situation develops during the trial of the injunctive proceedings or where the defendants specifically allege that the complainant has employed spies and agents who incited, promoted, and encouraged the strike or some unlawful act that brought about the injunction, then the proceedings shall cease at that point and the court shall proceed immediately to take testimony respecting such allegation. If the court shall find that the allegation is true, then the court shall fix threefold damages in favor of the defendants and dissolve the injunction. I have decided upon the threefold damage provision on account of identically the same provision being embodied in the Clayton Act. After a determination of that question, then the amendment sets out the manner in which judgment shall be entered and appeal taken. The ordinary procedure is provided for.

The entire purpose of the amendment is to prevent the complainant in strike cases hiring detectives and other agents to incite and promote and encourage the men to go on strike, or hiring detectives or other agents to commit unlawful acts and then attribute such acts to the employees.

I think, Mr. President, that the disclosures made in the Indianapolis Street Railway case show the most reprehensible conduct ever exhibited in the history of America. In that case private detectives were hired by the employer actually to encourage and promote a strike and then to have all the blame fixed upon the employees. There ought to be some responsibility, and I am endeavoring to fix that responsibility upon the complainants, so that if they employ such agents and detectives to promote and encourage and incite unlawful acts or incite strikes or incite anything because of which the complainant expects to have an injunction issued to restrain them, then there will be some provision in the law which will be a warning to the complainants that such things must not happen, and if they do happen the complainants must respond in damages threefold for the unlawful and unwarranted acts committed by them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, but I have a few amendments to offer to improve its language. Some of the provisions of the amendment seem to be rather ambiguous and obscure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out, in line 5, the words "in connection with industrial relations" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "for the purpose of securing information concerning a labor dispute."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does that amendment appear in line 5?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It appears in line 5. The language there is as follows:

(b) If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person directly or indirectly employed by him in connection with industrial relations—

The phrase "in connection with industrial relations" seems to me to be exceedingly obscure. I propose to substitute for it the words "for the purpose of securing information concerning a labor dispute."

Mr. BORAH. After the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana there follow the words "has incited, promoted, or encouraged the labor dispute"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer another amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, in line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "the labor dispute" and insert "the same."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That becomes necessary by reason of the adoption of the preceding amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer a third amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "giving rise to the proceedings."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, the author of the amendment, a question as to the clause which reads:

> * * * and shall assess against the complainant, and the defendants shall recover threefold, the loss, expense, and damage caused by the issuance of such restraining order or temporary injunction, together with all reasonable costs.

Has language such as that ever been passed upon by the courts in proceedings of this nature?

Mr. BLAINE. I think that has been passed upon by the court in cases arising under the Clayton Act, which provides that there shall be threefold damages for loss inflicted by violation of the act; and in injunction proceedings, I think in every jurisdiction, where a person obtains an injunction, and finally the injunction is dissolved, the court may render judgment for the loss, damage, attorney's fees, witness fees, all costs, and in some cases twofold or threefold for the actual damages, as a punitive measure. I have not any doubt about that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before the vote shall be taken on the amendment, I think it proper to call the attention of the author of the amendment and others to certain considerations which may have weight. We all know that in times of widespread labor controversies, when strikes are threatened or are imminent, various methods of strategy are resorted to by the parties to the controversy. The Senator from Wisconsin, the author of the amendment, referred a few moments ago to one that is very impressive. That was a case, as I heard him, where persons actually serving the employers found their way by devious methods into positions of influence in the employment of the laborers and became ostensibly the representatives of the laborers. It was, of course, unfair, but nevertheless it might happen again in an acute controversy. If it had not become known that these persons were actually incited to their action by the employers, the employees themselves would have been responsible. Under this amendment the course pursued by the persons referred to in stimulating and bringing on the labor trouble were nominally employed by the laborers.

I am wondering whether there have not been numerous instances in which persons of the class referred to in the amendment have worked their way into positions of trust when as a matter of fact they had insidious purposes in mind. Many times it might be possible that those secret machinations would not become known. On the face of the employment, they are representatives of the organizations of which they are officers. They are members of one of the railway brotherhoods, for instance, in a railway strike, and they have secured that employment for the purpose of making trouble. What protection would the brotherhoods have against that sort of condition under this amendment? They could not get any relief. If they sought relief from a court of equity, as, for instance, the dissolution of an injunction, they would be denied it; and, of course, the same thing is true of the other side of the controversy if similar processes are pursued by their opponents.

It occurs to me that while the intention of this amendment is to be approved, it is possible that it might be used as an agency of oppression. I wonder if the author of the amendment has given consideration to that phase of the matter.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I had originally drafted the amendment, it is my understanding that these persons employed as detectives would be employed for the particular purpose of inciting, promoting, and encouraging a labor dispute. The persons who are employees of the company—in its employ—seeking better terms of employment, better pay, better conditions, would not be employed for that purpose at all; but they are the ones who are the victims of the spies who get into the organization. They are, in fact, not employees of the company except for the particular purpose of spying on the organization.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the success of their efforts depends upon their keeping secret the purpose of their employment. If it becomes known that they have worked their way into the organizations for the purpose of spying or of reporting to their actual masters, their usefulness would be, of course, at once at an end.

I am speaking now, however, of the case where a detective, just for instance, induces a railway brotherhood to give him employment for the purpose of helping to conduct a strike. He is actually employed by others who have adverse interests to the laborers. That is just one illustration; but that fact is not known. That fact, of course, is secret. He is actually the emissary of the opponent of the laborer, though he is nominally in the employ of the laborer; and he commits an act that indicates that he is stimulating labor troubles. The laborers themselves want a measure of relief and protection; but they are estopped by reason of the fact that they have in their employ a man or men who have helped to work up the trouble of which they are complaining.

Of course, my suggestion is all based on the hypothesis that in times of strike questionable methods are resorted to by either side, or sometimes by both sides.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I was suggesting, when I drafted the amendment I did not have in mind the possibility of an employee actually being engaged in what I regard as an unlawful act. After I suggested the matter to the members of the subcommittee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] suggested and offered an amendment which has been adopted, I think, which relieves any danger whatever respecting that matter. That is my concept of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, which has been adopted—that where men are employed for the purpose of obtaining information, in those cases it clearly excludes a legitimate employee or an employee who is actually in the course of the particular employment, whatever it might be—street railway, railroad, industrial, or otherwise.

If that does not satisfy the Senator from Arkansas, I hope he will say so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that goes to the point I am raising. I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. BLAINE. I may not properly appreciate the point the Senator is making; but I do think the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana reaches the proposition that the Senator has suggested.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Which amendment has the Senator in mind?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? The amendment reads:

> If at any stage of the proceedings——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Where is that?

Mr. BORAH. At the beginning of the amendment:

> If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person directly or indirectly employed by him in connection with industrial relations has incited—

As I understand this amendment, an employer might employ a person for the purpose of securing information for him; but if the person went out of his way and joined in inciting a labor strike, nevertheless the man who employed him for the simple purpose of securing information as to the situation would be responsible. It seems to me that the language ought to be such as to bring home to the employer the knowledge of what this man was going to do. Otherwise, I do not think triple damages should be assessed against a man for employing a person for a perfectly legitimate purpose when the man does an unlawful thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Without the knowledge or consent of his employer.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not in my mind the language of the amendment as offered by the Senator from Montana; but, as it occurs to me, it was "directly or indirectly employed by him for the purpose of obtaining information."

To my mind, an employee of a street-railway company—the Indianapolis Street Railway Co., for example—who would accept employment for the particular purpose of obtaining such information when his own fellow workers were protesting against labor conditions, or protesting against the small amount of money they received, would be betraying the very men who were seeking justice in that case; and the employer would be doing an immoral act to employ one of the employees to obtain that information.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that in a controversy of this kind the complainant might well employ a person to secure for him inside information with reference to the plans and purposes of the strikers, and so forth. That might not be in every sense just the proper thing to do; but it does seem to me that an employer is in a wholly different position when he employs a person to acquire information and gives him information than he would be when we undertake to make him responsible for that man going out and inciting a riot. The employer might be just as much opposed to this detective doing that thing, if he had knowledge of it, as you or I would be; but he would have a right to have the legitimate information as to what was going on if he could get it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is my opinion that the criticism made by the Senator from Idaho is sound. I am satisfied now that neither the language offered by myself nor the language in the bill as originally framed meets the situation. I think something like this should be substituted: "Anyone who, at the instance of the employer, becomes a member of the association for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of his employer "——

Mr. BORAH. I think that would be better.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I believe something of that kind ought to be substituted for the language of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not the exact language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and which has been adopted. The Senator from Montana has just suggested some appropriate language that would obviate the criticism of the Senator from Idaho. The Senator from Montana is drafting that particular language; and I think if we can suspend for a moment or two it will be perfected.

I want to say in connection with this matter that we need not be altogether too tender hearted respecting the employers. I know from experiences we have had in my own State that there were certain detective agencies that were set up for the very purpose of furnishing spies in these labor disputes. That is their particular business, and it is a most reprehensible business. Those spies go into a labor dispute with the knowledge of the employer. It is not like a common, ordinary employment agency, where some one is employed in the course of the employer's business to do a specific, particular thing, but from the very inception it is an unlawful thing which the detective agency proposes to do. From the very inception it is almost a criminal thing; and the employers know full well that that entire strike is turned over to the direction and engineering of the detective agencies. So the employer is put on his guard; and he ought not to be protected against a spy, even though the spy runs contrary to the instructions of the principal. When the principal employs a spy he ought to be charged with the full responsibility of every act, lawful or unlawful, that that spy may commit.

Mr. President, I do not think we need to have any tender care in these matters respecting any danger which might come to an employee who is employed by the employer during the course of a strike for some other purpose than that in which the employee had engaged prior to the strike, because that employee at once ceases to be a bona fide member of the organization, or the proposed organization, and he, in turn, becomes a part of the conspiracy to defeat the very purpose of the men who are struggling for decent wages and fair conditions under which they may labor.

Mr. President, my view of the situation is that the act of anyone who is employed as a spy for the purpose of inciting or engineering or promoting a strike ought to bind the principal in those cases, and the purpose of inflicting threefold damages, of course is punitive. There is a wrong; a tort has been committed; a wrongful thing has been done; and the punitive damages are imposed as punishment for the wrongdoing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Idaho whether this language will not meet the situation, "If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person, at the instance of the employer, becomes a member of any organization of employees being a party to a labor dispute in the interest of the employer and under employment by him has incited, promoted," and so forth? Does that meet the view of the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. I rather think it would, but it is a little difficult to deal with this kind of an amendment in this manner. I did not see it until about 30 minutes ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is rather hurried.

Mr. BORAH. I rather think it would meet my view. I shall not make any further objection at this time, but I am perfectly clear that it must be brought home to the employer that this man is doing a wrong thing with his knowledge.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was heretofore adopted be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I offer this amendment, after the word "person" in line 4 to insert the words "at the instance of the employer becomes a member of any organization of employees being a party to a labor dispute in the interest of the employer and under employment by him."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly apparent to all Senators here that putting important amendments into a bill on the floor, and without some consideration, is not a proper way to legislate. I doubt very much the wisdom of our putting on an important amendment like this without any consideration, especially when it is more or less technical, added to a bill which is going to be assailed on all sides, on constitutional grounds and every other ground. To draft an amendment now to that kind of a bill on a technical subject just when we are ready to vote on the passage of the bill and put it before the Senate is hardly fair to Senators.

I do not feel in this particular case that I ought to ask Senators to vote for the amendment, although I am in entire sympathy with it. The amendment was never proposed to me by anybody during the years the committee has been investigating this question. It seems to me it would be a good thing to put something into the bill so as to make impossible such a thing as the terrible occurrence which happened in the street-car strike in Indianapolis, Ind., an indefensible thing, a cruel, inhuman thing. But I said when it was presented that the amendment ought to have been presented to the committee, and that we ought to have had an opportunity to analyze it.

Objection is made to the amendment on the floor which seems to be well taken, and an attempt is made to revise it and to remodel it. If we were going over until to-morrow before a final vote on the bill, I would not have any objection, of course, to taking the amendment up, and I would like to see it in shape.

I want to remind Senators, too, that we have in this bill, in section 6, particularly, a limitation of financial responsibility which has received a great deal of criticism and is still criticized from many quarters, and is claimed by some to be unconstitutional, it being said that we will have this difficulty and that difficulty to contend with.

The pending amendment goes to the liability for damages of certain persons. I would like, especially since it has been remodeled, to examine it to see whether there is any confliction between it and other sections of the bill which seek to remove liability and fix liability in certain cases.

I do not want to vote against the amendment, and I do not intend to, but I hope the Senator from Wisconsin, under all the circumstances, will withdraw it. I suggest that he send it to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, where this bill is under consideration, and take the matter up with the chairman of that committee, or some member of the committee, and if the amendment can be put onto the bill in the House and be brought up in conference, it could easily be threshed out, and if something beneficial can be written from it, it can be properly written in conference.

I want to call attention to another thing. To whom are the damages to be paid? In my judgment, what we ought to do in order to remedy the kind of a situation sought to be reached is to make it a criminal offense, and punish any corporation or official of a corporation, or of a union, or any other organization, that will employ a detective for the purpose of arousing the other side to call strikes or to do the kinds of things the people in Indianapolis did. Such things ought to be crimes. When damages are to be assessed, how is it to be shown how much a union, for instance, was damaged in a case of that kind? That is another question which strikes me at first blush to be one difficult of decision, to tell just what the measure of damages is to be.

Taking it all in all, it seems to me we should not take any chance on putting anything not necessary into this bill, just on the eve of its passing.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, during my service here I have found it very often the case that many of the provisions in a bill as it finally passed were proposed from the floor of the Senate or the floor of the House of Representatives. I appreciate that this amendment was not submitted to the committee, nor were the amendments in the cases to which I have referred submitted to the committees having charge of the legislation. I do not conceive that to constitute any valid reason for the rejection of an amendment.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think it is proper to suggest that this bill first received the consideration of five of the best-trained minds of the country with respect to the drafting of the bill. I need not name those men. They are well known to the subcommittee. One of them was to a large extent responsible for much of the language in the bill. This matter, of course, came to our attention when we heard former Governor Grosbeck, of Michigan, describe the Indianapolis Street Railway contest, and the committee had that information before it. Yet the committee did not turn its attention to the almost criminal acts which happened in that case.

That is no fault of the committee. Their minds did not turn that way. I am sure my mind did not turn that way, nor did it occur to me that the Indianapolis Street Railway case presented a situation which was so grossly wrong until I undertook an investigation of the hearings preparatory to this debate.

As I studied the testimony and the practices involved, my mind at once set upon the question of whether or not we could prevent that sort of thing. I went to the Clayton Act, and I found in that act that, where there was a violation of the act resulting in damage to anyone, the persons aggrieved would have the right to sue in court and obtain threefold damages.

The Clayton Act does not set up any rule for determining the method by which those damages are to be assessed. There is no measure of damages set up in the Clayton Act. I know of no law imposing damages which sets up the rule for assessing the damages. There may be such, and I assume there are, but in most cases the rule as to damages is a rule which comes under rules of evidence, and usually they are not set up in the substantive law. So I followed exactly the proposal of the Clayton Act in this respect.

We can not set up in this measure a detailed statement of the rules which are to prevail respecting the imposition of damages. That must be left to the court. The court will ascertain from the testimony just what expense the injured party may have been put to, and assess the damages accordingly. That is the rule in practically all cases, both at law and in equity.

Mr. President, at the outset of what I have been saying I mentioned the fact that our committee had the assistance of several men in this country, all specialists respecting labor legislation, distinguished men.

After I had discussed the Indianapolis case on the floor of the Senate it occurred to me that we ought to have a provision in the bill, as a part of section 8, which would reach the very thing that we are intending to reach by the amendment. So I sent the preliminary draft to one of those men who so generously furnished of his time and his great ability in assisting the committee in drafting the bill. With the few changes that he made in the first paragraph respecting the very matter about which the Senator from Montana has submitted an amendment, I received the suggested draft.

Mr. President, I am convinced that there is nothing technical about the amendment. The proposal in the amendment is identical with the proceeding in every case outside of labor disputes. If an injunction is obtained by a citizen against a municipal authority, we will say, for instance, restraining that municipal authority from undertaking certain public works, and that citizen complaining as a taxpayer is defeated in the injunctional proceeding, I doubt that there is a jurisdiction in the United States that does not provide that the defendant shall have the right to assessed damages against the complainant as soon as the injunction is dissolved upon a hearing, to assessed damages against the complainant not only for the actual loss of the defendant but for all the costs which the defendant has incurred, all the attorney's fees, and so forth. It is identically the same procedure. There is nothing technical about it.

Practically every lawyer in the actual practice of the law has had experience respecting injunctions such as I have described. To my mind it is not of such character to warrant the defeat of the amendment simply because we feel that it is altogether too technical. My own opinion is that the provision as contained in the amendment I have submitted does exactly what I think every Senator wants to do without the suggested amendment; but on the suggestion of the Senator from Montana. I appreciated that the language might be made a little more clear, might be made a little more desirable.

I think, after all, that none of the things which have been suggested is ever going to happen to a bona fide workingman. The things that have been suggested are the things which are going to happen to the man who has betrayed his fellow workmen, who has sold himself out to his employers, who is a creature detestable in the eyes of every honest workingman. That kind of a workingman has ceased to be one of his fellow workers and has become a part of the conspiracy in connection with the employer to defeat the rights of the workingmen.

Mr. President, my own feeling is that with the perfecting language, which I do not concede to be necessary, but with the suggestions of the Senator from Montana, the amendment ought to be adopted. The purpose is proper. The subject is not a technical one after all. I do not want to delay the Senate longer or to delay a vote longer, but simply because the committee has not passed on the matter, simply because we have not set forth the rules of damage, simply because somebody may trump up these imaginary cases, is no just reason why the amendment should be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin the Senator from Montana proposes to strike out all after the word "person" in line 4 down to and including the word "relations" in line 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

At the instance of the employer becomes a member of any organization being a party to a labor dispute in the interest of the employer and under employment by him.

And, in lines 6 and 7, to strike out the words "giving rise to the proceedings," and in line 6 to strike out the word "the" and insert the word "such."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I submit an inquiry to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]? If we adopt the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Montana, then under its provisions as they will be amended one of the defendants or all of the defendants can go into court and allege that this state of facts exists, and thereupon all proceedings are suspended until that question is settled?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not under the amendment offered by me. That is in the body of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the point about which I am making inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is my judgment the Senator is correct about it. However, my amendment does not touch that feature of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then one defendant may appear in court and specifically allege that this state of facts exists, and then the temporary injunction or any restraining order issued is suspended and inoperative until that question is settled. That would be the effect of the amendment if it is adopted, as I understand it.

I want to correct the abuses we have had from this system of recklessly issuing injunctions. I think the laboring people of our country are entitled to protection against such abuses. But, of course, if we adopt an amendment of this character it only requires one defendant to go into court to have all the temporary restraining orders suspended, the temporary injunction made inoperative, and tie up the proceedings and place things back where they were originally until these questions are determined. Do we want to go that far?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is mistaken. If one of the defendants goes into court and makes that allegation, it does not dissolve the temporary injunction or the permanent injunction. All it does is to have the court stop the proceedings at that point and take testimony. It does not do away with the temporary injunction or the permanent injunction until such time as the court makes its finding of fact that the allegation is true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator does not think it should dissolve it?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator does not think it does suspend it?

Mr. WHEELER. It does not suspend it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. But it does according to the language of the amendment. I have raised that question.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to the provision on page 2 of the amendment, line 19:

Any restraining order or temporary injunction issued in the action instituted by the complainants shall be dissolved as a part of the judgment for damages and costs on the special issue joined.

That is after there has been a finding that the allegation of the defendant was sustained.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is true. That is where the court has reached its decision after having held inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER. That is when the temporary injunction or restraining order is dissolved.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; but if the Senator will pardon me, I call attention to line 8, page 1, after the word "therewith," where it says:

All proceedings hereunder shall be suspended and any restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative until a hearing and determination has been had to determine the facts with respect to such allegations.

That is the point I am raising.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not the Senator in favor of suspending the injunction and making it inoperative during the time the hearing is going on, when facts develop as they did in the Indianapolis Street Railway case, where a direct representative of the company itself in fact was made president of the union and incited the men to strike against the company?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am in favor of such a proceeding.

Mr. BLAINE. That is what this does.

Mr. TRAMMELL. But the Senator's amendment goes further than that.

Mr. BLAINE. I think not.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator's amendment states that if one of the defendants goes into court and alleges these things, then the restraining order shall be suspended and become inoperative.

Mr. BLAINE. The very moment a defendant makes that allegation the court at once enters upon a determination of the question. It is a part of the whole proceeding. It is ancillary to the main action, but it is carried on at the same time. The judge does not continue to take evidence respecting the violation of the injunction. The judge then takes evidence respecting the allegation, and that may all be done in a day or half a day or in an hour or two; but it is during those proceedings that testimony shall be taken immediately. There is no other construction to be placed upon it, unless the judge determines that the case must go over, or that sort of thing. That we can not control any more than we can control individual action with respect to judges trying any lawsuit. A judge may adjourn court overnight, of course.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I want to give every protection possible to the laboring man. I think I have always been his friend and my record will show that fact, but it does seem to me we are going a long way when we provide that in the event one defendant goes into court and alleges that somebody connected with some employer has incited a strike or some unlawful act, that then upon that allegation alone the court has to suspend the operation of any temporary injunction which previously has been issued. It is mandatory upon the court to suspend its operation. The law itself would suspend it. The court would not have to suspend it. It would be automatically suspended just upon one person going into court and making an allegation of that character.

Mr. BLAINE. The practice in the States, if this were the law, would be for the court, as soon as that question was raised, to treat it identically as the court treats an objection to the admission of evidence. The court would proceed at once to determine that issue and then continue with the trial of the case along the ordinary course usually adopted by courts.

Mr. WHEELER. May I make this suggestion to the Senator? What the Senator wants to do is to have the proceeding suspended. I think if the Senator would strike out, beginning in line 9, the words "and any restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative," that would answer the objection. I can not see any harm in letting the temporary injunction be operative pending the determination of the issue, if it has been granted. For instance, if a temporary injunction has been granted, then we would simply say that all proceedings pending shall be suspended until such time as a hearing and determination have been had upon the facts with respect to such allegation. We would then have it, in other words, in exactly the same position as it was at the time when the allegation was made. Then if the court finds on a final hearing of the evidence that the allegations are true he dissolves the injunction, if one has been granted, and finds damages in treble the amount, or whatever he feels they should be.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of course all lawyers in this body are familiar with the ordinary court procedure when an issue of this kind is raised. It is identically the same as in the case of an issue on the question of the introduction of evidence. The inoperativeness of the injunction is during the time that that testimony is being taken. Is there anyone who conceives that any court is going to undertake to enforce an injunction or that an injunction or restraining order would be violated while that proceeding was going on? I assume not.

I can also appreciate that the provision that the proceedings shall be suspended can only be construed to mean the proceeding which refers to the injunction. The suspension of the restraining order during that time may or may not be of any particular consequence. I have no great determination about it. I know that no court would proceed on the injunction if the special issue were being tried. However, if it satisfies the Senator's doubt, very well, I do not think it damages the purpose of the amendment very much.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the purpose of the amendment; I am entirely in sympathy with the purpose as proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, but the language which provides that the restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative until the hearing and determination, in my opinion, automatically suspends the injunction or restraining order. I wondered if the Senator desired to go that far; that with merely one defendant going into court and alleging that a certain condition exists, upon that allegation alone, under the law the injunction shall be suspended?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. If the allegation should be made and brought to the attention of the court, the court would have it in its power to suspend the operation of the injunction in accordance with the seriousness of the charge which has been made; but here it is proposed that the law itself shall suspend the operation. Does the Senator not think it is sufficient to leave it within the power of the court to control his own injunction after the charge shall have been made?

Mr. BLAINE. Where an allegation of the kind referred to is made, it is only going to be made in good faith. I think that the injunction ought to be made inoperative during that time. However, I do not think it is of sufficient consequence to waste very much time upon the proposition. Therefore, Mr. President, I will perfect my amendment by striking out the language beginning in line 9 and reading "and any restraining order or temporary injunction shall be inoperative."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. Is there objection to taking a vote upon the three amendments at one time, as they are related? The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the perfected amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as amended.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the object of the amendment proposed by the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is laudable and desirable in the highest degree. The evil which it is designed to prevent is, so far as the Senate is concerned, without a single defender or a single friend. But I join the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the eminent Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in beseeching the Senate not to encumber with this or any other hastily prepared amendment the pending anti-injunction bill which is the result of not only months but years of endeavor, and which, above every other measure now before the Congress, embodies the heart's desire of the millions of women and men who live by toil. The bill contains numerous beneficent provisions, but manifestly its supreme purpose is to outlaw the so-called "yellow-dog" contract—an agreement which no laboring man can sign without surrendering his constitutional rights of liberty and the pursuit of happiness and sacrificing all of his freedom and much of his self-respect. This contract makes the employer of labor an absolute master and the employee an abject slave.

The country that enforces it, perpetuates it, or tolerates it can not consistently boast that it is the land of the free. To my regret, it has been alleged that the "yellow-dog" contract was born in the State of West Virginia—the State which I venerate above every other in the Union. I hope that the allegation is without justification. But regardless of the place where the "yellow-dog" contract was brought to life, it is high time that this iniquitous instrumentality of intolerable tyranny be put to death. And after death it should be buried in a grave so wide and deep and secure that no black-robed Gabriel from his high seat of authority on a Federal bench can ever resurrect it with trumpet or tongue or pen.

The bill, if passed, will, in controversies which involve the rights of labor, put the law beyond the reach of that small but dangerous minority of Federal judges who habitually trample upon the rights of those who toil.

Let us not at this late hour endanger the validity of this most meritorious measure by adopting amendments which the committee has neither approved nor considered, and the effects of which we can not now pause to determine. Will not the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his amendment and permit the capital punishment of the "yellow-dog" contract to be inflicted without further delay?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, when the Clayton Act was passed it was hailed as being labor's charter of liberty. However, it was not very long until the courts held that the Clayton Act was merely a statement of the law as it always had been. It seems to me, Mr. President, in view of that situation, that the new substantial feature in the Clayton Act that was not the law theretofore is the provision respecting threefold damages that may be imposed for losses inflicted by the violation of the Clayton Act, unless it is the limited right of a jury trial in contempt cases.

Mr. President, if it should be found, as has been predicted time and time again, that by this bill we are simply writing into a statute the law as it now is, without this amendment we will have obtained no substantial additional legislation in the interest of the great mass of the workingmen.

I do not know what the courts are going to do when this bill shall become a law, and none of us can predict what they will do; but if the courts in the case of this bill do that which they did when the Clayton Act became a law—a law which its proponents proclaimed as being the charter of liberty for the workingmen—then the important thing that we will have accomplished, in addition to the present law, is this very wholesome measure giving threefold damages to the workingmen when the employer has employed spies and other agents to bring about a strike and to commit unlawful acts, all of which are charged to the workingman.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything further. As I said before, I think this amendment is unwise, but the Senator from Wisconsin is so insistent, and I think so unreasonable, that it seems to me the Senate ought at least to have a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

There is no Member of the Senate but would like to punish representatives of great corporations and combinations who are guilty of such conduct as that shown in the Indianapolis street-car strike. Practices of the kind there indulged ought to be made crimes. However, that was the only instance that came to us during the investigation and the hearings which have been going on for more than three years, and probably nothing similar will ever again occur. Yet, for fear of such a possibility, we are going to put in the bill this amendment, I think, unwisely.

Now, let us see just what the amendment is. I do not think it has all been read at the desk, including some of its very material parts, but it starts out—and this language, as I remember, has not been changed:

If at any stage of the proceedings under this act—

Not a proceeding, but "the proceedings"—

it shall appear to the court—

That is one way, but there is another way—or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them—

If it shall appear to the court or be alleged, then certain things follow, which are set out in the amendment. I want to call the attention of the Senate to what will happen under this language if it shall be incorporated in the bill, and it should remain in the bill, in case it were endeavored to make it effective.

There are two ways in which operations may be suspended: One is, if it shall appear to the court—I suppose from the evidence as it develops—then the court can take action, and it would be his duty to take action; but another way is if it is alleged by the defendants or any of them, then what shall happen?—

All proceedings hereunder shall be suspended * * * until a hearing and determination has been had.

Let us see about that. A corporation commences an action for the purpose of securing an injunction against nonunion labor men. The corporation makes a friend of one of the defendants and then starts proceedings to obtain an injunction. The laboring men desire to have it dissolved, but just about the time the laboring men are making a motion to dissolve it, a defendant comes forward and makes the necessary allegation. That is all he has to do. He does not need to have any proof under this amendment; he merely has to make the allegation; he makes it and thereupon automatically all proceedings shall be suspended until a hearing and determination has been had on the facts in regard to the defendant's allegation.

The injunction stands; a motion to dissolve it can not be entertained by the court, even if the court wanted to do so, because the defendant has made an allegation that suspends everything. That is what we are likely to bring about on the spur of the moment by adopting an amendment that has been written at the desk by somebody and never even been read to the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. It is hardly fair to draw the conclusion the Senator has drawn, and the Senator should read the balance of the sentence, which provides:

And the court shall thereupon require that issue be joined and that a hearing thereon shall be immediately held.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. That is just what the court will do; but the hearing will be had upon the allegation of that defendant, who may have no other object in view except to hold that injunction intact until the court finishes hearing his application on his allegation; and with a good lawyer behind him I can conceive how he might keep the court busy for some time on his allegation. In the meantime the defendants, who may have a good reason to dissolve the injunction, are completely frustrated because this allegation is made.

I have to disagree with the men I have been working in conjunction with so long, so faithfully, so pleasantly, and so agreeably. I did not intend to say anything, but just to let the matter go, because it is disagreeable to oppose either one or both of my colleagues who have been earnestly and faithfully giving of their time and their ability for so long on this extremely difficult question. I do feel, however, that we are making a mistake, even though if we had time to frame the language and get it right the amendment would go in and would do some good. It might prevent the recurrence of such a thing as happened at Indianapolis; but without this law it never has recurred, so far as I know. It may have happened a good many times and never have been found out, but this is the only case that has come to our notice.

I do not believe we ought to take the chances now, on this bill, of doing it. It does not seem to me that it is quite fair for Senators to urge it under these circumstances. It seems to me, with another committee considering this same bill, word for word—or it was, when it was introduced, word for word the same as this bill—they could give the matter consideration, and see if it could not be put in shape so that we would not have this difficulty.

I think I have pointed out a difficulty that would mean that this would be damaging. It seems to me it would, although we may be able to remedy that if we discuss it long enough, and if we strike out the provision giving the defendant the right to make this allegation and have a suspension of everything while this proceeding is being held, and tie the hands of the court so that it can not dissolve an injunction that has been issued.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, this amendment seems to be between two jaws of a vise that are pressing together. On the one hand, the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] thought it would be a most unusual situation, a most unjustifiable thing, to have the temporary restraining order held inoperative during the hearing. On the other hand, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is afraid that the employer is going to make one of his friends the defendant, and that friend is going to set up this allegation that some spy or detective has been employed while the laboring man is endeavoring to get the injunction dissolved.

Mr. President, when we have on the one hand those who contend that the injunction or the temporary restraining order should not be inoperative and on the other hand those who contend that it should be operative, it seems to me that a situation is created which is very similar to the situation that the able Senator from Nebraska described yesterday.

We need not fear respecting any injury that is going to come to the workingman because of this provision. Why, Mr. President, it is not only the Indianapolis case that is involved. Those who are familiar with the Debs case know that to a large extent certain detective agencies in this country, employed by the railroads, aided and abetted and encouraged and incited that strike. I have not any doubt that in the railroad strike in which Judge Wilkerson issued an injunction, many of the bridges that were burned, many of the houses that were burned, most of the injuries that were done to property were due entirely to agents of the railroads, who provoked the commission of those very acts; and it is common knowledge that those agents were the spies and detectives of the employers in many cases.

Mr. President, when this issue arises in an injunction proceeding it is particularly provided that thereupon that issue must be joined, and testimony must be immediately taken, and that issue determined in identically the same manner as is an objection to the admission of evidence.

As to the fear that the workingman may be injured by this provision, Mr. President, I dare say that most of the major strikes in this country have been engineered by detectives and spies employed by the employers. I think that if that question were to be brought to an issue in this country we would have the overwhelming testimony of every labor organization in this country that they know in their own hearts that most of the violence in the major strikes are due to wilful interference by the employers themselves in hiring detectives and agents to incite, to form plots, to destroy property, and then charge all of that destruction, those crimes and that damage, to the workingmen.

That is the fact of the matter, and we might just as well recognize it now. Explanations or apologies or regrets can not cover up the fact that, after all, employers have as their agents provocateurs detectives and spies at the bottom of every strike, and the source of practically every act of violence. In few instances, and largely in individual cases only, have the laboring men of this country ever gone out on a strike when they committed violence and the destruction of property.

No, Mr. President; the conspiracies that have been alleged against the working people have come about in many cases because the employers have hired some unconscionable yellow dog in the form of a human being to worm himself into a labor organization or to set up situations whereby workingmen would be incited. Whenever those workingmen were incited, they were incited by the will and by the wish of the employer.

So, Mr. President, I am sorry that there should have been any objection to this amendment by my colleagues. As I said, it is true we have not had a long time to consider it. I received it only on yesterday morning from one of the men who are largely responsible for the language contained in this bill. He drafts legislation for his State with such accuracy that I know of not a single important act of that State that has ever been declared unconstitutional or invalid. So this language has been carefully used, carefully worked out, by one most skillful in his calling, whose drafting of legislation in the past has met the test of every court whenever it has been brought before the courts.

So, Mr. President, I am quite willing to have a record vote upon this amendment. I believe that if this bill is held, as was the Clayton bill, simply to reenact legislation as it presently is, all that we shall have left other than we now have will be this very wholesome provision that employer shall respond in punitive damages for their unlawful acts in promoting, inciting, and developing strikes, and the disorders and violence that have attended strikes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when I had the floor before I neglected to state something that I wanted to refer to that the Senator had spoken of before; but he has called the fact to my attention again and reminded me of it.

It does not take a very able man—nor does it take any very great degree of statesmanship—to leave the impression in a case of this kind that those who have been associated with you for years are either not acting in good faith or their ignorance is so great that they are not able to see the right way to go.

The particular thing I wanted to refer to, however, was the intimation, twice made by the Senator from Wisconsin, that this whole bill is going to be declared unconstitutional except this amendment of his, brought in at the eleventh hour to save the situation and to get out of the hopper something that would stand the test of going through the courts.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. I think in all fairness the Senator can not charge that I have made any such intimation.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has made it twice.

Mr. BLAINE. I said that it has been intimated. I think the act will be declared valid and of some considerable importance, and I do not intimate that it is a mere skeleton. I say there are members——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, I will sit down and let the Senator proceed. If the Senator is through, I will go on now. If he is not, I will take my seat and let him finish.

Mr. President, the Senator did say, I think in almost so many words, that if the court held the balance of the act unconstitutional this amendment would still stand. When the court passes on the act, as it ultimately will, if it holds that the act is unconstitutional the Senator from Wisconsin will probably have the honor of reading in an opinion from the Supreme Court that the great lawyer, the member of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, the member of the subcommittee that framed the bill, the Senator from Wisconsin, had almost himself confessed that the whole thing was a hoax, anyway, and that all he expected to save out of it was that little amendment that he thought of just a few minutes before the vote was taken.

Read the opinion of the Supreme Court, where they refer to what the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee said in some of the decisions when they were taking the life blood out of the Clayton Act, as the Senator has intimated. They quoted reports from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, they quoted speeches and controversies taking place on the floor of the House of Representatives, and I had hoped that we would get through this bill and enact it into law and that no court with a fine-tooth comb, in going over the debates, could ever find any doubt cast upon the constitutionality of the bill by any of its friends. But I am afraid I will have to give that hope up now.

It would be something great if we saved this amendment out of the awful mess, then to find that a bogus defendant would have the right, in a case where an injunction had been issued and a hearing was being had upon a motion to dissolve, to walk into court some bright morning and make certain allegations, without any proof, without any evidence of the truth of them, simply make them on paper and put them before the judge; and what must the judge do? He must stop a hearing on a motion to dissolve the injunction if he is engaged in it at that time.

Nobody has denied but that that would be the effect. That might never occur, but it is just as likely for a corporation which wants to get an injunction and make it stick to hire a defendant who will make such allegation, as it is for the corporation to hire some detective to join a union, the matter about which the Senator has been speaking.

They could do either thing or both of them, and if they do this one, they will at least be able to keep an injunction in force as long as they can keep a judge busy hearing this man's allegation.

I suppose the first allegation he would make, if the case were pending in Chicago, would require evidence from San Francisco, and there would be a delay in order to get the man's witnesses there. All kinds of jobs would be put up to delay the hearing or prolong it, and while it is proceeding, even though we concede, for the sake of the argument, that the injunction never ought to have been issued, even though we concede that there sits a judge, honest and upright and able, who realizes, as far as he has gone in the hearing, that it probably is illegal and wrongfully issued, his hands are tied, he can not proceed another step, he can not issue a single order, until he steps aside and takes up this side issue and determines whether or not the allegations of this bogus defendant are true or false.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to have read the amendment which was offered, so that we may know what the amendment is.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator the amendment in its perfected form?

Mr. BLACK. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw a part of his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new paragraph to section 8, as follows:

(b) If at any stage of the proceedings under this act it shall appear to the court or be specifically alleged by the defendants or either of them that the complainant or any detective or other person at the instance of the employer becomes a member of any organization being a party to a labor dispute in the interest of the employer and under employment by him has incited, promoted, or encouraged such labor dispute or any unlawful acts in connection therewith, all proceedings hereunder shall be suspended until a hearing and determination has been had to determine the facts with respect to such allegations, and the court shall thereupon require that issue be joined and that a hearing thereon shall be immediately held.

Testimony relating to such issue shall be taken in the same manner as is taken in equity proceedings within the jurisdiction of said court.

After the taking of such testimony, if the court finds against the complainant on the issue joined, the court shall make a finding of fact and shall assess against the complainant, and the defendants shall recover three-fold, the loss, expense, and damage caused by the issuance of such restraining order or temporary injunction, together with all reasonable costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee, incurred in the action instituted by complainants, and where there is more than one defendant, the amount assessed and recovered shall be apportioned among the defendants according to their respective interests as may be shown in said proceeding, and any restraining order or temporary injunction issued in the action instituted by complainants shall be dissolved, as a part of the judgment for damages and costs on the special issue joined.

A review of such findings and the judgment rendered in such matter may be had in the same manner as is now provided for a review in equity proceedings of which said court has jurisdiction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote, and I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. He would vote on this question as I intend to vote, so I can vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of my general pair, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 69, as follows:

So Mr. BLAINE's amendment as modified was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD a copy of the "yellow-dog" contract featured in the Red Jacket case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the contract in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the contract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT OF LILLYBROOK COAL CO., ONE OF THE PLAINTIFFS IN THE RED JACKET INJUNCTION CASE

It is mutually agreed between Lillybrook Coal Co., hereinafter for convenience referred to as the first and second party, respectively, as follows:

1. The first party hereby employs, and the second party hereby agrees to work for the first party in or around its coal mines upon the terms and conditions herein stated, which employment may be terminated by either party hereto at will.

2. The mines of the first party are operated by nonunion labor, and the first party agrees that it will continue to so operate said mines so long as the second party remains in its employ.

3. The second party accepts the above employment with the express understanding and agreement that he is not a member of the United Mine Workers of America or other labor unions; that he will not agree to become a member of or join the United Mine Workers of America or other labor union while he is in the employ of the first party; and if at any time while he is in the employ of the first party he desires to become a member of the United Mine Workers of America or other labor union, he will immediately quit the employment of the first party. And the second party further agrees that while he is in the employ of the first party he will not make any effort to induce, persuade, or otherwise procure the other employees, present or future, of the first party to agree to become a member or members of the United Mine Workers of America or any other labor union or to join the same.

Witness the following signatures.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, inasmuch as Congress is without power to declare contracts of the character of that just inserted in the RECORD contrary to public policy and therefore void, I submit some landmarks in the history of the law in relation to the liberty of contract.

Acts limiting the hours of labor on works conducted by municipal corporations were held, because they violated the liberty of contract, to be void, in the case of People v. Coler, (166 N. Y. 1); in State v. Varney Electrical Supply Co. (160 Ind. 338), and in Ex parte Kuback (85 Calif. 274). But on the contrary they were held valid in Milwaukee v. Raulf (116 Wis. 172 (1916)), and in Campbell v. City of New York (216 N. Y. S. 141).

Acts fixing the time for the payment of wages, as, for instance, on the 1st and 15th of each month, were held to be in violation of liberty of contract and therefore unconstitutional in Frorer v. People (141 Ill. 171), Braceville Coal Co. v. People (147 Ill. 66), Johnson v. Goodyear Mining Co. (127 Calif. 4), and State v. Potomac Coal Co., (116 Md. 380). It was held otherwise in Erie Railroad Co. v. Williams (233 U. S. 685).

Acts fixing the method of paying employees as on the basis of the weight of unscreened coal were held unconstitutional in Goodcharles v. Wegeman (113 Pa. 431), Ramsey v. People (142 Ill. 380), in re House bill 203 (21 Colo. 27), and Harding v. People (160 Ill. 459); but it was held otherwise, namely, that such acts were constitutional in McLean v. Arkansas (211 U. S. 539), and in Rail Coal Co. v. Ohio (236 U. S. 338).

Acts limiting the hours of labor for women were held unconstitutional in Ritchie v. People (155 Ill. 98), but held otherwise in Commonwealth v. Hamilton Manufacturing Co. (120 Mass. 383), Wenham v. State (65 Nebr. 394), State v. Buchanan (29 Wash. 602), Muller v. Oregon (208 U. S. 412), Riley v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts (232 U. S. 671), Miller v. Wilson (236 U. S. 385), and Radice v. New York (264 U. S. 292). That is to say, Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois in the case of Ritchie v. People (155 Ill. 98) held that if a woman desired to contract to work 16 hours a day or 20 hours a day, she had a perfect right to do so, and no law could be enacted prohibiting anybody from employing her for those unconscionable hours.

Acts limiting the number of hours of labor in which men could be employed were held unconstitutional, as an unlawful limitation of power to enter into contracts, in Low v. Rees Printing Co. (41 Nebr. 127), in re Morgan (26 Colo. 415), Lochner v. New York (198 U. S. 45); but it was held otherwise in Bunting v. Oregon (243 U. S. 426), and Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S. 366).

Acts requiring employees to be paid in cash instead of scrip or store goods were held unconstitutional in Millet v. People (117 Ill. 294), State v. Goodwill (33 W. Va. 179), State v. Loomis (115 Mo. 307), Leep v. Railway Co. (58 Ark. 407), State v. Haun (61 Kans. 146), and State v. Missouri Tie & Timber Co. (131 Mo. 563), but the contrary view was taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in Erie Railroad Co. v. Williams (233 U. S. 685).

Acts prohibiting railroad employees from contracting away the right to recover for injuries were held to be violative of the liberty of contract in Shaver v. Pennsylvania Co. (71 Fed. 931), but the contrary view was taken by the Supreme Court of the United States in Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway Co. v. McGuire (219 U. S. 549).

Injunctions granted on the basis of "yellow-dog" contracts were authorized in State v. Julow (129 Mo. 163), Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161), Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1), Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell (245 U. S. 229), Vail-Ballou Press v. Casey (212 N. Y. S. 113), People v. Marcus (185 N. Y. 257), Bittner v. West Virginia-Pittsburgh Coal Co. (15 Fed. (2d) 652), International Organization, etc., v. Red Jacket Consolidated Coal & Coke Co. (18 Fed. (2d) 839), Flousheimer v. Schlesinger (187 N. Y. S. 891), McMichael v. Atlanta Envelope Co. (151 Ga. 776), Third Avenue Railway v. Shea (179 N. Y. S. 43), Cyrus Currier & Sons v. International Molders Union (93 N. J. Eq. 61), Kinloch Telephone Co. v. Local Union (275 Fed. 241), Callan v. Exposition Cotton Mills (149 Ga. 119), and Montgomery v. Pacific Electric Railway (293 Fed. 630).

But injunctions were denied upon that basis in La France Co. v. Electric Workers (108 Ohio St. 61), Interborough Rapid Transit Co. v. Green (227 N. Y. S. 258), and Interborough Rapid Transit Co. v. Lavin (247 N. Y. 65).

I call attention to these cases for the purpose of enforcing upon the minds of Senators that a wide change has come over the judicial minds of the country as to the question of liberty of contract, the earlier decisions having been induced, as everybody must now realize, by reason of the judges entertaining antiquated and obsolescent views concerning economic questions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I am going to vote for the bill with a good deal of shame, and I want to explain in a word or two why I expect to vote that way.

As I said yesterday in the Senate when there were but few Senators present, in about 30 years of active practice in one of the largest industrial districts in the country and with clients who probably employed the majority of the working people in my home county and with a pretty continuous round of cases that kept one in court most of the time, I am proud to say that I have never yet applied for or obtained an injunction in a strike or other labor difficulty.

That is not because of any tenderness of feeling for rioters, but because I have always felt convinced that a court of equity ought not by that method to be converted into a police court, that the burden of enforcing such injunctions as those is too great for the court to be asked to assume. I am happy to say that I have always been able to dissuade those of my clients who wanted such injunctions from applying for them. So that it is nothing new for me to say that I disapprove of the use of the injunction in labor cases. I always have and always will.

Furthermore, I disapprove of the "yellow-dog" contract. If it is competent for us to outlaw it by declaring it contrary to the public policy of the United States, I think it is a happy thing that we should do it. To that extent I approve wholly of the purposes of the bill.

But the reason why I am ashamed to vote for the bill is the condition in which it leaves the Senate. I was scolded yesterday afternoon by my distinguished friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON] for presuming to read the bill and criticizing its terms, for presuming to think that, professing to be the friends of labor, we might after all be hurting the workman; and yet I am sincerely convinced that in section 6 of the bill, if the House does not amend it, we have taken away from the workmen of America rights much more substantial than we are giving them. That section provides that—

> No association or organization—

And that means either a labor union or an organization of employers or a corporation employer—> participating or interested in a labor dispute shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization, of such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

Let there come a strike, let the employer hire a lot of plug-uglies to guard his plant, let them commit all sorts of outrageous and wanton acts of cruelty upon undefending strikers—and we have known it to happen—under this section which we pretend to pass for the sake of the workingman those unoffending victims will be denied any recourse in the United States courts for damages unless they can show that the corporation actually and formally ratified those unlawful acts. The time will come when some workman will go into court with such a case and will find himself confronted with that section. Then I assure you, Mr. President, we will not be considered the friends of the workingman and we will not be thanked for what we are doing to-day.

Furthermore, let us take some of the preposterous provisions on the other side. Let us suppose that the I. W. W. foment a strike in the Western Union Telegraph Co. Let us suppose that they preach anarchy and violence and destruction of property, and that the head of the I. W. W. gets up in public meetings and asks his followers to go out and wreck every Western Union office they come upon. In the face of that section and in that situation, the company could not file a bill against the head of the I. W. W. to restrain him from preaching anarchy until it previously had notified the chief of police or the sheriff in every town, village, and little community in the United States in which it had an office. That is the preposterous result which we are working out here under section 6 of the bill. Every effort which we have made to ameliorate that in the course of the consideration of the bill has been voted down with a crash, with only about 15 or 16 votes recorded in favor of our efforts to try to perfect such absurdities.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss it any further. Only because of my conviction that the principal objects of the bill are wise and in spite of my conviction that the bill is very badly drawn, and because of my hope that in the House of Representatives those provisions to which I have called attention will be reviewed and corrected, in the hope that the House will do its work better than we have done it here, I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate long. I have taken no time upon the presentation of the views that I hold and that I have held for 40 years on legislation of this sort, but I do not propose that the last word said in behalf of the bill or in regard to it shall be a word of shame. I shall vote for the bill because of a feeling of pride and exultation—pride because finally the Senate has done something of justice to the men who toil in this land, with exultation, sir, because of the overwhelming vote I know is going to be recorded in favor of the bill.

If I felt one atom of shame in regard to a measure of this sort, I would not stand upon this floor and say that I vote for it with a feeling of shame. I vote for it with pride and exultation. At last we have seen the day in the Congress of the United States when the Congress dare legislate against Federal injunctions outrageously and infamously issued against working and toiling people. So let us have a roll call, and those who vote with shame may vote with shame, and we who vote with pride and joy and exultation will record our votes in that fashion, too.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, as a member of the minority of the Judiciary Committee, I have given considerable study to the provisions of this bill, and as a result of that consideration, both in committee and subsequent to the meetings there, I have proposed, on behalf of the minority, some amendments which I believed, and which I still believe, would, if adopted, have made this bill preferable in many respects to its present form. I did that, as I explained at the outset of this debate, not for the purpose of delay and not with any idea of interfering with the passage of the bill.

I have repeatedly said, and I say now at the close of the debate, that I favor some of the provisions of this measure. I have been in favor of them from the outset. If by its enactment we can in any measure discourage the use of the employment contracts which have been the subject of so much discussion here, not only in this debate but in proceedings heretofore in the Senate; if by the enactment of this measure we can prevent the issuance of offensive forms of injunctions in labor disputes and can curb the courts which have issued them in the past, then there is merit in the legislation; there will be merit enough in it to justify my vote, Mr. President, in favor of the bill, notwithstanding I see some grave objections to other provisions of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is an important measure. In many respects I think the most important feature of the bill is that which undertakes to deal with the so-called "yellow-dog" contract. I feel that this legislation will put an end to that character of contract.

It is true that the Supreme Court of the United Sates in some two or three cases has, in effect and under certain circumstances, held such contracts to be valid under the liberty-of-contract clause of the Constitution, but questions involving the "yellow-dog" contract have never gone to the Supreme Court under the circumstances in which they will now go there under this measure, if, indeed, they shall go there. This is the first time the Congress has legislated in respect to the "yellow-dog" contract. It has now declared it to be contrary to public policy. The Supreme Court, as I understand the decisions, has said that the judgment of the legislature, with respect to public policy, will not be disturbed unless it is in pronounced contravention to some specific provision of the Constitution. Whatever there may be in the way of controversy as to other provisions of the bill, I entertain no doubt as to what the future will be as to this form of contract. I feel that it will no longer be recognized as a contract enforceable in a court of equity. If that is the result a great achievement in the interest of justice and fair dealing will have been recorded. For this reason I am pleased with the opportunity of recording my vote for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Several Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when the name of Mr. DAVIS was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is necessarily absent from the Senate at this time. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], who is unavoidably absent. I am advised if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote on this measure. Therefore I am at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). As previously announced, I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. I understand if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty tc vote and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Understanding that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], with whom I have a general pair, would if present vote as I expect to vote, I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I understand if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I am therefore free to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. If he were present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. NEELY (when Mr. MCKELLAR's name was called). The Senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is absent because of a death in his family. I am authorized to state that if present he would vote in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Understanding that if present he would vote as I intend to vote, I feel free to vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on public business. If he were present and free to vote, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce that if the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I believe my colleague [Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma] has not voted. I desire to say that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN].

I have also been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is necessarily absent on emergent official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily absent from the Senate. If present, they would vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to state that my colleague the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

The result was announced—yeas 75, nays 5, as follows:

REPORTS OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon:

S. 2292. An act for the relief of Col. Frank B. Parker (Rept. No. 355); and

S. 2373. An act authorizing the payment to Peter C. McCartin of allotments made to his children under the veterans' act of 1924 (Rept. No. 356).

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon:

S. 1882. An act for the relief of Paul Little (Rept. No. 357);

S. 1883. An act for the relief of Stephen Sawyer (Rept. No. 358); and

S. 1885. An act granting compensation to John Spiropoulos (Rept. No. 359).

PROPOSED PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. From the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and on behalf also of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 354) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the report which accompanies the bill and is a part of the report be printed in the body of the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made; and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

The report is as follows:

[Sen. Rept. No. 354, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES and Mr. CUTTING from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs submitted the following report (to accompany S. 3377):

Your Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs to whom were referred a number of bills providing for Philippine independence, having considered all such bills, favorably report S. 3377, with an amendment, and recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

UNCERTAINTY

For a generation the Philippine problem has confronted the American people. It involves American-Philippine political and economic relations, and the fulfillment of our promise of independence. This bill provides sound, feasible, and fair methods of substituting a definite policy for one of evasion and indecision.

Virtually every witness who testified at the extended hearings conducted by the committee has expressed the view that the present uncertainty characterizing our relations with the Philippine Islands should be removed. Further delay threatens to be prejudicial to the best interests of both the United States and the Philippine Islands.

FAR-EASTERN SITUATION

The present situation in the Orient should not prevent Congress from taking definite action at this time. Unsettled conditions in the Far East may continue indefinitely; they may be settled at any time. But the varying fortunes of conflicting forces on the other side of the Pacific can not justly be set up by us as an excuse for delaying the solution of our own problems.

The fulfillment of our duty toward the Philippines must be determined upon the basis of the welfare of the people of the United States and the 13,000,000 people of the Philippine Islands. To change at this time a long-established national policy because of conditions for which we are not responsible and over which we have no immediate control will be interpreted as timidity or weakness.

FACTORS RECONCILED

The recommended bill harmonizes previous divergent views of different groups likely to be affected by Philippine independence. The American farmer, speaking through the three national farm federations, and the dairy organizations, is seeking protection from Philippine competition in our markets. The American workingman, through the American Federation of Labor and organizations on the Pacific coast and the American Legion, is demanding the exclusion of Filipino immigrants as well as protection from duty-free Philippine articles produced at lower labor costs.

Nor can the rights and interests of the Filipino justly be ignored. He, too, is under the American flag, and that not by his own choice but by our own will and purpose. While he remains under our sovereignty he should not be discriminated against. It would be politically immoral to retain indefinitely the Filipino people in their present status as wards and at the same time impose upon them discriminating and unfair restrictions and inhibitions.

We have also to consider our promise to grant independence to the Filipino people. By the declaration of our political parties, by the utterances of our Presidents, by an enactment of Congress, we have pledged our word as a Nation that they should at some time be free and independent. This we can not evade.

INDEPENDENCE—"WHEN" AND "HOW"

Only two questions require decision. First, "When shall the Philippines be granted independence?" and, second, "How shall it be granted, so as to protect both Philippine and American welfare?"

To achieve these purposes the bill in the main provides that:

PHILIPPINE AUTONOMY

1. The Philippine people shall adopt a constitution for the government of the "Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands," pending complete independence. Under that government they will enjoy complete autonomy as to domestic affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations specified in the bill that safeguards both the sovereignty and responsibilities of the United States.

TRADE LIMITATIONS

2. Pending final withdrawal of American sovereignty, free importations of certain Philippine products into the United States shall not exceed specified limits, based upon the status quo as represented by estimated importations from existing investments.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS

3. Pending independence Philippine immigration to the United States is limited to a maximum annual quota of 100.

COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

4. At the end of a 15-year period from the date of inauguration of the Government of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands the people of the islands shall at a plebiscite vote on the question of independence, and if a majority favor independence the President is directed to recognize and declare the independence of the Philippine Islands, whereupon, for all purposes, they will become to the United States a foreign nation.

These provisions establish a process for the independence of the Philippine people and the adjustment in an orderly manner of our economic and other relations with them. They provide the erection of the new Philippine national structure and at the same time a safe and satisfactory transition from the present dependent to the future independent status.

GRADUAL TRADE ADJUSTMENT

Twenty-five years ago free-trade relations were established between the United States and the Philippine Islands. This was done by the American Congress against the expressed desire and despite the opposition of the people of the islands. As a consequence of free trade Philippine industries and trade with the United States have developed on that basis.

This arrangement resulted in an artificial stimulation in the production of certain articles and manufactures in the Philippines and an extraordinary increase in the volume of American-Philippine trade, with a corresponding decrease in the trade of the islands with foreign countries.

Obviously, the existing free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippines can not be terminated abruptly without serious injury to Philippine economic interests and American trade with the islands. Both require a definite time to prepare for the change. Investments made on the basis of free trade must be given sufficient time for adjustment or liquidation without loss. Philippine industries must be given time to establish themselves on a competitive basis before they are placed outside the tariff walls of the United States.

MORAL OBLIGATION

The United States owes a moral obligation to the Filipino people in this respect. The existence of this obligation can not be too strongly urged. We can not justify an act which might result in the destruction of the economic structure that we helped to build in the Philippines, with the consequent lowering of standards of living.

Orderly transfers of sovereignty have usually been accompanied by such provisions as those proposed in this bill. When the Philippines was ceded to the United States by Spain we agreed by treaty to permit Spain for 10 years to send her merchandise and her ships to the Philippines on the same basis as ours. We did this because we realized that we would injure Philippine and Spanish interests if we abruptly forced on the Philippine Islands a different arrangement.

A DEFINITE PERIOD

The committee examined the various proposals as to the time at which independence should be granted. There were proposals for immediate independence, for independence in 5 years, for independence in 10 years, and for independence in 20 years. The reasons urged in behalf of each were considered. Your committee concluded that a period of 15 years was required for the necessary readjustments. Some members of the committee yielded their preference for earlier independence on the basis of evidence developed at the hearings. There was unanimous agreement that a definite date for independence should be set.

During the first 10 years of the 15-year period there is to be a limitation on importations from the Philippines to the United States, as already indicated.

GRADUATED TARIFF

At the end of the first 10 years there begins a gradually increasing tariff levy in the nature of an export tax imposed and collected by the Philippine government on all Philippine free exports to the United States. From the eleventh to the fifteenth year the tax will rise from 5 per cent to 25 per cent of the American tariff on like articles imported from foreign countries. Products on the general free list of the American tariff will not under the bill be subject to this tax.

Three main considerations dictated this procedure. First, to permit Philippine industries to adjust themselves to the new conditions following independence; second, to induce the Filipino people to diversify their products on a competitive basis and to find new markets for them; third, to protect American agriculture, labor, and industry.

PAYMENT OF BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

One additional reason prompted this provision. It will permit the Philippine Islands to discharge its bonded indebtedness prior to independence, for the bill requires that all collections from this tax shall constitute a special fund to be used exclusively for the retirement of the outstanding indebtedness of the Philippine Islands. It is believed that at the end of the 15-year period the bonded indebtedness of the islands will have been paid.

UNITED STATES SOVEREIGNTY UNIMPAIRED

The sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands during the 15-year period continues unimpaired. The United States also retains such authority in the government of the Philippine Islands as is commensurate with its responsibilities. But it is in the nature of reserved powers and authority rather than of actual and affirmative participation in the government. The authority can be exercised when the necessity for it arises. Additional power is unnecessary. These powers extend to the safeguarding of the finances of the Philippine nation, its currency, its foreign trade, its public lands and mines, public order, and all those activities and services of the government necessary for the protection of life, liberty, and property. It is also provided that foreign relations of the islands shall be exclusively under the control and supervision of the United States, and that our Government at any time may intervene to prevent a violation of international obligations.

RECOGNITION OF AMERICAN AUTHORITY

Pending the consummation of independence, United States sovereignty will be represented in the Philippines by a high commissioner who shall be recognized as such representative by all the departments of the Philippine government.

The high commissioner will act as the representative of the United States, and he is vested with all of the prestige and authority required for the discharge of such responsibility. He shall have access to all of the records of the Government and have means at his disposal to acquaint himself with the manner in which the government of the Commonwealth is conducted.

Should any of the eventualities described in the bill involving either the finances or the orderly functioning of the government occur, the way is clear for the exercise of authority by the United States to remedy such conditions.

The governmental powers reserved to the United States and the United States high commissioner are effective to insure an efficient administration of public affairs in the Philippines.

MILITARY AND NAVAL BASES

Under the provisions of this bill the United States also reserves the right to retain its present military, naval, and other reservations in the Philippine Islands. It is also provided that after independence the United States may obtain, by lease or purchase, any additional territory in the Philippine Islands as it may consider necessary for such purposes. There is no provision in the bill to prevent the withdrawal or abandonment of these naval and military posts at any time, or at the end of the 15-year period. That question is left to future decision and determination.

The bill provides that after the people of the Philippine Islands have voted for independence, and prior to the final withdrawal of American sovereignty, a conference of representatives of the American and Philippine Governments shall be held for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands.

CONCLUSION

The recognized policy of the United States in the Philippines has been to prepare the Philippine people for independence. Every Chief Executive since our occupation of the islands down to the present time has stated that we were in the Islands for the purpose of assistance rather than colonization. Every legislative act of Congress has contemplated ultimate independence. For 30 years every act of the American Government in the islands has been based upon and in furtherance of this policy.

We have done much for this people. Americans may justly say that we have accomplished for the Filipino people in 30 years what no other nation has done for the people of its colonies in a hundred years. And the Philippine people appreciate that fact and they are grateful to America for it.

The rest they must do and achieve by themselves. And they can only have this opportunity if, as this bill provides, they are permitted to lead their own life, enjoying their independence, free to exercise their own genius, and thrown on their own resources.

Every condition precedent that we have imposed upon them has been fulfilled. They now have a stable government. We can no longer postpone a definite solution of the question of independence without serious injustice. The Filipino people unitedly are respectfully, but with insistence, urging their independence. Further delay will not be understood by them and can not be justified by us.

The bill, as amended, is as follows:

A bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

CONVENTION TO FRAME CONSTITUTION FOR PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

SECTION 1. The Philippine Legislature is hereby authorized to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, which shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives in the capital of the Philippine Islands, at such time as the Philippine Legislature may fix, to formulate and draft a constitution for the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, subject to the conditions and qualifications prescribed in this act, which shall exercise jurisdiction over all the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty of peace concluded between the United States and Spain on the 10th day of December, 1898, the boundaries of which are set forth in Article III of said treaty, together with those islands embraced in the treaty between Spain and the United States concluded at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900. The Philippine Legislature shall provide for the necessary expenses of such convention.

CHARACTER OF CONSTITUTION—MANDATORY PROVISIONS

SEC. 2. The constitution formulated and drafted shall be republican in form, shall contain a bill of rights, and shall, either as a part thereof or in an ordinance appended thereto, contain provisions to the effect that, pending the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands—

(a) All citizens of the Philippine Islands shall owe allegiance to the United States.

(b) Every officer of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take and subscribe an oath of office, declaring, among other things, that he recognizes and accepts the supreme authority of and will maintain true faith and allegiance to the United States.

(c) Absolute toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured and no inhabitant or religious organization shall be molested in person or property on account of religious belief or mode of worship.

(d) Property owned by the United States, cemeteries, churches, and parsonages or convents appurtenant thereto, and all lands, buildings, and improvements used exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes shall be exempt from taxation.

(e) Trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States shall be upon the basis prescribed in section 6.

(f) The public debt of the Philippine Islands and its subordinate branches shall not exceed limits now or hereafter fixed by the Congress of the United States; and no loans shall be contracted in foreign countries without the approval of the President of the United States.

(g) The debts, liabilities, and obligations of the present Philippine government, its provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities, valid and subsisting at the time of the adoption of the constitution, shall be assumed and paid by the new government.

(h) Provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of an adequate system of public schools primarily conducted in the English language.

(i) Acts affecting currency, coinage, imports, exports, and immigration shall not become law until approved by the President of the United States.

(j) Foreign affairs shall be under the direct supervision and control of the United States.

(k) All acts passed by the legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be reported to the Congress of the United States.

(l) The Philippine Islands recognizes the right of the United States to expropriate property for public uses, to maintain military and other reservations and armed forces in the Philippines, and, upon order of the President, to call into the service of such armed forces all military forces organized by the Philippine government.

(m) Appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be as now provided by existing law and shall also include all cases involving the constitution of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

(n) The United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and for the maintenance of the government as provided in their constitution, and for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty and for the discharge of government obligations under and in accordance with the provisions of their constitution.

(o) The authority of the United States high commissioner to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, as provided in this act, shall be recognized.

(p) Citizens and corporations of the United States shall enjoy in the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands all the civil rights of the citizens and corporations, respectively, thereof.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 3. Upon the drafting and approval of the constitution by the constitutional convention in the Philippine Islands, the constitution shall be submitted to the President of the United States, who shall determine whether or not it conforms with the provisions of this act. If the President finds that the proposed constitution conforms substantially with the provisions of this act, he shall so certify to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, who shall so advise the constitutional convention. If the President finds that the constitution does not conform with the provisions of this act, he shall so advise the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, stating wherein in his judgment the constitution does not so conform and submitting provisions which will in his judgment make the constitution so conform. The Governor General shall in turn submit such message to the constitutional convention for further action by them pursuant to the same procedure hereinbefore defined until the President and the constitutional convention are in agreement.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTION TO FILIPINO PEOPLE

SEC. 4. After the President of the United States has certified that the constitution conforms with the provisions of this act, it shall be submitted to the people of the Philippine Islands for their ratification or rejection at an election to be held within four months after the date of such certification, on a date to be fixed by the Philippine Legislature, at which election the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall have an opportunity to vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and ordinances appended thereto. Such election shall be held in such manner as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which the return of the election shall be made. The Philippine Legislature shall by law provide for the canvassing of the return and, if a majority of the votes cast on that question shall be for the constitution, shall certify the result to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, together with a statement of the votes cast hereon and a copy of said constitution and ordinances. The Governor General shall, in that event, within 30 days after receipt of the certification from the Philippine Legislature, issue a proclamation for the election of officers of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands provided for in the constitution. The election shall take place not earlier than three months nor later than six months after the proclamation by the Governor General ordering such election. When the election of the officers provided for under the constitution has been held and the results determined, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall certify the results of the election to the President of the United States, who shall thereupon issue a proclamation announcing the results of the election, and upon the issuance of such proclamation by the President the existing Philippine government shall terminate and the new government shall enter upon its rights, privileges, powers, and duties, as provided under the constitution. The present government of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the orderly transfer of the functions of government.

If a majority of the votes cast are against the constitution, the existing government of the Philippine Islands shall continue without regard to the provisions of this act.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY AND RIGHTS TO PHILIPPINE COMMONWEALTH

SEC. 5. All the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaties mentioned in the first section of this act, except such land or other property as has heretofore been designated by the President of the United States for military and other reservations of the Government of the United States, and except such land or other property or rights or interests therein as may have been sold or otherwise disposed of in accordance with law, are hereby granted to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands when constituted.

RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES PENDING COMPLETE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 6. After the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands trade relations between the United States and the new government shall be as now provided by law, subject to the following exceptions:

(a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all refined sugars in excess of 50,000 long tons, and on unrefined sugars in excess of 800,000 long tons, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(b) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(c) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all yarn, twine, cord, cordage, rope, and cable, tarred or untarred, wholly or in chief value of manila (abaca) or other hard fibers, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of a collective total of 3,000,000 pounds of all such articles hereinbefore enumerated, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries.

(d) In the event that in any year the limit in the case of any article which may be exported to the United States free of duty shall be reached by the Philippine Islands, the amount or quantity of such articles produced or manufactured in the Philippine Islands thereafter that may be so exported to the United States free of duty shall be allocated, under export permits issued by the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, to the producers or manufacturers of such articles proportionately on the basis of their exportation to the United States in the preceding year; except that in the case of unrefined sugar the amount thereof to be exported annually to the United States free of duty shall be allocated to the sugar-producing mills of the islands proportionately on the basis of their production in the preceding year, and the amount of sugar which may be exported from each mill shall be allocated between the mill and the planters on the basis of the proportion of sugar received by the planters and the mill from the planters' cane, as provided in their milling contract. The government of the Philippine Islands is authorized to adopt the necessary laws and regulations for putting into effect the allocation hereinbefore provided.

(e) The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall impose and collect an export tax on all articles that may be exported to the United States from the Philippine Islands free of duty under the provisions of existing law as modified by the foregoing provisions of this section, including the articles enumerated in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c), within the limitations therein specified, as follows:

(1) During the eleventh year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 5 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries;

(2) During the twelfth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 10 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries;

(3) During the thirteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 15 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(4) During the fourteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 20 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

(5) After the expiration of the fourteenth year after the inauguration of the new government the export tax shall be 25 per cent of the rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries.

The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall place all funds received from such export taxes in a sinking fund, and such fund shall, in addition to other moneys available for that purpose, be applied solely to the payment of the principal and interest on the bonded indebtedness of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, municipalities, and instrumentalities until such indebtedness has been fully discharged.

When used in this section in a geographical sense, the term "United States" includes all Territories and possessions of the United States except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam.

SEC. 7. Until the final and complete withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands—

(1) Every duly adopted amendment to the constitution of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval. If the President approves the amendment or if the President fails to disapprove such amendment within six months from the time of its submission, the amendment shall take effect as a part of such constitution.

(2) The President of the United States shall have authority to suspend the taking effect of or the operation of any law, contract, or executive order of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands which, in his judgment, will result in a failure of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands to fulfill its contracts, or to meet its bonded indebtedness and interest thereon, or to provide for its sinking funds, or which seems likely to impair the reserves for the protection of the currency of the Philippine Islands, or which, in his judgment, will violate international obligations of the United States.

(3) The chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall make an annual report to the President and Congress of the United States of the proceedings and operations of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall make such other reports as the President or Congress may request.

(4) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a United States high commissioner to the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands who shall hold office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is appointed and qualified. He shall be known as the United States high commissioner to the Philippine Islands. He shall be the representative of the President of the United States in the Philippine Islands and shall be recognized as such by the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, by the commanding officers of the military forces of the United States, and by all civil officials of the United States in the Philippine Islands. He shall have access to all records of the government or any subdivision thereof, and shall be furnished by the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands with such information as he shall request.

If the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands fails to pay any of its bonded or other indebtedness or the interest thereon when due or to fulfill any of its contracts, the United States high commissioner shall immediately report the facts to the President, who may thereupon direct the high commissioner to take over the customs offices and administration of the same, administer the same, and apply such part of the revenue received therefrom as may be necessary for the payment of such overdue indebtedness or for the fulfillment of such contracts. The United States high commissioner shall annually, and at such other times as the President may require, render an official report to the President and Congress of the United States. He shall perform such additional duties and functions as may be lawfully delegated to him from time to time by the President.

The United States high commissioner shall receive the same compensation as is now received by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and shall have such staff and assistants as the President may deem advisable and as may be appropriated for by Congress. He may occupy the official residence and offices now occupied by the Governor General. The salaries and expenses of the high commissioner and his staff and assistants shall be paid by the United States.

The first United States high commissioner appointed under this act shall take office upon the inauguration of the new government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

(5) The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the selection of a Resident Commissioner to the United States, and shall fix his term of office. He shall be the representative of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands and shall be entitled to official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of credentials signed by the chief executive of said government. He shall have a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, with the right of debate, but without the right of voting. His salary and expenses shall be fixed and paid by the government of the Philippine Islands. Until a Resident Commissioner is selected and qualified under this section, existing law governing the appointment of Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands shall continue in effect.

SEC. 8. (a) After the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands—

(1) For the purposes of the immigration act of 1917, the immigration act of 1924 (except section 13(c)), this section, and all other laws of the United States relating to the immigration, exclusion, or expulsion of aliens, citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall be considered as if they were aliens. For such purposes the Philippine Islands shall be considered as a separate country and shall have for each fiscal year a quota of 100. This paragraph shall not apply to a person coming or seeking to come to the Territory of Hawaii who does not apply for and secure an immigration or passport visa.

(2) Citizens of the Philippine Islands who are not citizens of the United States shall not be admitted to the continental United States from the Territory of Hawaii (whether entering such Territory before or after the effective date of this section) unless they belong to a class declared to be nonimmigrants by section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 or to a class declared to be nonquota immigrants under the provisions of section 4 of such act other than subdivision (c) thereof, or unless they were admitted to such Territory under an immigration visa. The Secretary of Labor shall by regulations provide a method for such exclusion and for the admission of such excepted classes.

(3) Any Foreign Service officer may be assigned to duty in the Philippine Islands, under a commission as a consular officer, for such period as may be necessary and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, during which assignment such officer shall be considered as stationed in a foreign country; but his powers and duties shall be confined to the performance of such of the official acts and notarial and other services which such officer might properly perform in respect of the administration of the immigration laws if assigned to a foreign country as a consular officer, as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

(4) For the purposes of sections 18 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917, as amended, the Philippine Islands shall be considered to be a foreign country.

(b) The provisions of this section are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all the penal or other provisions of such laws, not inapplicable, shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this section. An alien, although admissible under the provisions of this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of the immigration laws other than this section, and an alien, although admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws other than this section, shall not be admitted to the United States if he is excluded by any provision of this section.

(c) Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this section, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act.

PLEBISCITE ON THE QUESTION OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 9. (a) At any time after the expiration of the fifteenth year and before the expiration of the seventeenth year after the inauguration of the government provided for in this act the people of the Philippine Islands shall vote on the question of Philippine independence. The Legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall provide for the time and manner of an election for such purpose, at which the qualified voters of the Philippine Islands shall be entitled to vote.

(b) If a majority of the votes cast are in favor of Philippine independence, the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the President of the United States, who shall, within 60 days after the receipt of such report, issue a proclamation announcing the results of such election, and within a period of two years after such report the President of the United States shall withdraw and surrender all right of possession, supervision, jurisdiction, control, or sovereignty then existing and exercised by the United States in and over the territory and people of the Philippine Islands, and, on behalf of the United States, shall recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as a separate and self-governing nation and acknowledge the authority and control over the same of the government instituted by the people thereof, under the constitution then in force: Provided, That the constitution has been previously amended to include the following provisions:

(1) That the property rights of the United States and the Philippine Islands shall be promptly adjusted and settled, and that all existing property rights of citizens or corporations of the United States shall be acknowledged, respected, and safeguarded to the same extent as property rights of citizens of the Philippine Islands.

(2) That the government of the Philippine Islands will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States not later than two years after his proclamation recognizing the independence of the Philippine Islands.

(3) That the officials elected and serving under the constitution adopted pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be constitutional officers of the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands and qualified to function in all respects as if elected directly under such government, and shall serve their full terms of office as prescribed in the constitution.

(4) That the debts and liabilities of the Philippine Islands, its Provinces, cities, municipalities, and instrumentalities which shall be valid and subsisting at the time of the final and complete withdrawal of the sovereignty of the United States, shall be assumed by the free and independent government of the Philippine Islands; and that where bonds have been issued under authority of an act of Congress of the United States by the Philippine Islands, or any Province, city, or municipality therein, the Philippine government will make adequate provision for the necessary funds for the payment of interest and principal, and such obligations shall be a first lien on the taxes collected in the Philippine Islands.

(5) That the government of the Philippine Islands, on becoming independent of the United States, will assume all continuing obligations assumed by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain ceding said Philippine Islands to the United States.

(6) That by way of further assurance the government of the Philippine Islands will embody the foregoing provisions (except paragraph (3)) in a treaty with the United States.

(c) If a majority of the votes cast are against Philippine independence, the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall so report to the Congress of the United States for their action regarding the future political status of the Philippine Islands: Provided, That until Congress otherwise provides the Philippine Islands shall revert to the status established by this act for the first 10 years after the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

NOTIFICATION TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

SEC. 10. Upon the proclamation and recognition of the independence of the Philippine Islands under their constitution, the President shall notify the governments with which the United States is in diplomatic correspondence thereof and invite said governments to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

TARIFF DUTIES AFTER INDEPENDENCE

SEC. 11. After the Philippine Islands have become a free and independent nation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from other foreign countries: Provided, That within six months after the people of the Philippine Islands have voted on the question of Philippine independence, if a majority of the votes cast are in favor of independence there shall be held a conference of representatives of the Government of the United States and the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, such representatives to be appointed by the President of the United States and the chief executive of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, respectively, for the purpose of formulating recommendations as to future trade relations between the Government of the United States and the independent government of the Philippine Islands, the time, place, and manner of holding such conference to be determined by the President of the United States; but nothing in this proviso shall be construed to modify or affect in any way any provision of this act relating to the procedure leading up to Philippine independence or the date upon which the Philippine Islands shall become independent.

CERTAIN STATUTES CONTINUED IN FORCE

SEC. 12. Except as in this act otherwise provided, the laws now or hereafter in force in the Philippine Islands shall continue in force in the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands until altered, amended, or repealed by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands or by the Congress of the United States, and all references in such laws to the Philippines or Philippine Islands shall be construed to mean the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. The government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands shall be deemed successor to the present government of the Philippine Islands and of all the rights and obligations thereof. Except as otherwise provided in this act, all laws or parts of laws relating to the present government of the Philippine Islands and its administration are hereby repealed as of the date of the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 13. The foregoing provisions of this act shall not take effect until accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for the purpose of passing upon that question as may be provided by the Philippine Legislature.

AMENDMENTS TO PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE BILL

Mr. BROUSSARD submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3377) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ARTICLE BY HON. GEORGE STEWART BROWN ENTITLED "THE PEOPLE SHOULD BE CONSULTED AS TO CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES"

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in the Journal of the American Bar Association by Hon. George Stewart Brown, judge of the United States Customs Court, the subject of which is "The People Should Be Consulted as to Constitutional Changes."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Bar Association Journal of June, 1930]

THE PEOPLE SHOULD BE CONSULTED AS TO CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGES—METHOD OF RATIFICATION BY STATE CONVENTIONS IS GREATLY TO BE PREFERRED, AS IT COMES NEARER TO SECURING THEIR DIRECT ASSENT TO RADICAL CHANGES UNDER WHICH THEY MUST LIVE—DEFECTS OF METHOD OF SUBMISSION TO LEGISLATURES

By Hon. George Stewart Brown, judge of the United States Customs Court

In connection with the many proposals to amend the Federal Constitution attention should be called to the fact that proposed amendments do not have to be ratified by legislatures, as is commonly supposed to be the case. On the contrary, the amending clause of the Constitution (Art. V) wisely provides an alternative method for ratification by State conventions. The latter method is greatly to be preferred, because it comes much closer to consulting the people themselves and to procuring their direct assent to any suggested change. The way it works out amounts virtually to a popular referendum. It takes longer than ratification by legislatures. Speed is not everything, however. Indeed, deliberation is much to be preferred to mere speed in making serious and grave constitutional changes. The original Constitution was ratified by the people acting through State conventions.

The method of submission to legislatures in practice has a number of patent defects.

In the first place, members of a legislature may be, and frequently are, elected before the suggested constitutional change is proposed by Congress. Consequently, when the proposal comes before them, unless they refuse to act at all, they are compelled to act without the aid of a previous discussion of the matter during their campaign for election. Even if the particular legislature is elected after Congress makes the proposal, the election is involved in and affected by a multitude of other issues and policies of a local, personal, political, and partisan character. Mere partisanship sometimes controls everything else in their selection. Their position upon the pending change in the Federal Constitution may be an element in their election, but it generally is a very slight element, submerged and buried among the many other issues involved.

Consequently, legislatures elected before proposal always completely lack a popular mandate for their action in ratifying or rejecting a proposed Federal amendment. Likewise legislatures elected after proposal also lack a distinct, definite, or certain popular mandate for their action, due to this confusion with so many other things.

State conventions, on the other hand, must necessarily be elected after proposal upon the sole issue of saying "aye" or "no" to the suggested change. In every district throughout the land a candidate for delegate favoring the proposal will run against a candidate for delegate opposing the proposal. The personality of such candidate will count for little or nothing. Local, partisan, and political considerations will not figure or influence their election. The sole consideration which will influence the voter will be the attitude of the candidate for delegate "for," or "against," the Federal amendment proposed. Thus the issue will be direct and certain, unconfused with all other issues, and the resulting popular mandate, for the action of the convention, will be certain, definite, and complete.

This constitutes a perfectly legal method of consulting the wishes of the people upon any proposed change in the Federal Constitution.

It is true that, except in the ratification of the Constitution itself, we have not used the State convention method in ratifying constitutional changes. However, it is hardly an intelligent argument against a superior method simply to cite neglect in using it. That is a state of political conventionality and stupidity we have not reached as yet.

One reason its use has been neglected is that out of 19 amendments proclaimed as ratified only 5, the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth, made radical changes in the organic law, for which the consent of the voters of the several States was reasonably or necessarily required. The first 10 (the Bill of Rights) were merely declaratory of the original purposes of the instrument. They carried out the gentleman's agreement, which procured the practically conditional ratification of New York, Massachusetts, Virginia, and South Carolina to the Constitution and later induced ratification by Rhode Island and North Carolina, who first rejected. They added no new matter. They merely expressed in definite, clarified language what the authors of the Constitution already understood it to mean. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth came from the arbitrament of civil war and recorded its results. They were used as a substitute for a treaty with the Southern Confederacy. Any treaty would have had the effect of recognizing the right of secession. The sixteenth, or income-tax amendment, merely reasserted a long-exercised Federal power, which a court decision had avoided. The eleventh also asserted a State prerogative, also previously claimed to exist and also avoided by a court decision. The twelfth and seventeenth merely rearranged the election of President and United States Senators, not affecting governmental power in any way. It was perhaps natural that these amendments were all proposed to legislatures. It is undoubtedly true that radical changes, such as the eighteenth and nineteenth, should have been proposed to State conventions to insure their popular sanction and approval. But that mistake should not be repeated in the future. Hereafter the people should be fully and completely consulted, through the convention method, as to any radical changes in the Constitution, or any redistribution of governmental powers therein, to insure popular consent to, and acquiescence in, such changes. This suggestion should be looked upon as purely nonpartisan and nonpolitical in character, as it undoubtedly is.

State conventions, elected to consider a proposed Federal amendment, would be called in each State by the legislature thereof, according to the machinery already existing therein for calling State conventions for amending the State constitutions. The legislature would have the authority to determine the apportionment of delegates to be elected by popular vote from the various political units of the State and the time and place of meeting, unless those things were already provided for by the existing State constitution. There are no political difficulties or stumblingblocks whatsoever attending such a method of ratification. One thing should be distinctly understood—Congress has nothing to do with calling the State conventions, their manner and form of procedure, mode of election, or selection of the time and place they should meet. Those details are entirely a matter of State determination, by the legislature of the State.

The persons selected by the people as delegates do not run for a political office, which would consume much time and labor and involve them in politics. Called simply to pass on a proposed Federal amendment, they would have no political power beyond debating the new Federal proposal and voting for its adoption or rejection. Distinguished persons from all the walks of life, business, professional, and labor, would gladly run for delegates to such conventions without detriment to their private work. For such conventions would merely assemble, debate, vote, and adjourn. Then the labor and political duty of the delegates is over. Distinguished advocates and opponents of the proposal would serve in such conventions, a far abler type than most of those who serve in State legislatures. The debates would be of a high grade and fully elucidate the subject, as were the debates by the distinguished men who took part in the State conventions which ratified the Constitution. As a consequence, the action of each State in ratifying or rejecting would have the proper weight and dignity which action upon grave constitutional changes should always involve.

Legislatures, on the contrary, frequently act upon Federal amendments without a popular mandate, and hastily without proper debate. Political considerations, pure and simple, frequently govern their action. Of the 38 legislatures which were announced as ratifying the nineteenth amendment, 30 were hold-over legislatures, elected before proposal, called hastily into special session, and necessarily acting without a popular mandate from their constituents. Ten States refused to ratify. There were also ratifications of the eighteenth amendment by legislatures which did not seem to be representative of the popular will in their States.

The precedent which must be followed is that submitting the Constitution itself to State conventions. The following extract from the Journal of Congress of the Confederation exhibits the proceedings of that body on receiving the report of the convention which framed the Constitution:

"United States in Congress assembled, Friday, September 28, 1787.

"Congress having received the report of the convention lately assembled in Philadelphia:

"Resolved, unanimously, That the said report, with the resolutions and letter accompanying the same, be transmitted to the several legislatures, in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State, by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the convention made and provided in that case."

The portion of the resolution of the Philadelphia Convention, referring to ratification by State conventions, which the above resolution of Congress carried out, read as follows:

"Resolved, That the preceding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled; and that it is the opinion of this convention that it should afterwards be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof under the recommendation of its legislature for their assent and ratification, and that each convention assenting to and ratifying the same should give notice thereof to the United States in Congress assembled."

Much subsequent friction could be avoided if we would always follow that historic precedent. In making radical constitutional changes ordinary political delicacy should move us to consult the pople who must live under them and whose government it is.

Had the fifteenth amendment been proposed to State conventions the history of the times indicates that it would have been defeated. (Speech of Allen Caperton Braxton, Virginia State Bar Association Proceedings for 1903.)

Had the eighteenth amendment been proposed to State conventions there is grave doubt whether it would have been ratified by 36 States. Moreover, had it been so ratified we would know that the people desired it, a question which has been a subject of violent dispute ever since it was proclaimed.

Had the nineteenth amendment been proposed to State conventions it seems certain that it would have failed.

We have been very remiss in the past in not procuring the express consent of the people through popularly elected State conventions to every radical constitutional change or shift of governmental powers between our State and Federal governmental agencies.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely the nomination of Charles A. Jonas, of North Carolina, to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of J. Lindley Green, of Alaska, to be register of the land office at Anchorage, Alaska.

Mr. COUZENS, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of Thad H. Brown, of Ohio, to be a member of the Federal Radio Commission for a term of six years from February 24, 1932.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

TREATIES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Executive KK (70th Cong., 2d sess.) and Executive A (72d Cong., 1st sess.).

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the treaties may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaties will be passed over.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of members of the Federal Farm Board.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] the matter of the confirmation of these appointments has been deferred. It is agreeable to the Senator now that some date may be set during the week. A few days ago the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] disclosed some opposition to the nominations, and I was wondering if we could come to an agreement as to some date this week when we might take up these matters.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think we might arrange some date during the week. I had desired to get some information in regard to certain activities on the part of the members of the board.

Mr. McNARY. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to consider the matter on Friday afternoon?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That will be agreeable to me if it is agreeable to others who are interested.

Mr. McNARY. I can speak for the Senator from South Dakota as agreeable to him. In my opinion, he is the only Member of the Senate with whom it is necessary for me to consult. No one else has brought the matter to my attention.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That will be agreeable to me.

Mr. McNARY. Then I give notice that I shall call up the confirmation of these nominations in executive session at 3 o'clock on Friday, or thereabouts.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Fred A. Bradley to be collector, customs collection district No. 9, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that this nomination may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made. That completes the calendar.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 2, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 1 (legislative day of February 24), 1932

POSTMASTERS

ALABAMA

Roger S. Bingham, Talladega.

FLORIDA

Thomas J. Chason, Tallahassee.

LOUISIANA

T. Lucien Ducrest, Broussard.
William T. Kent, De Quincy.
Roger F. Baudry, Garyville.
Louis Hebert, White Castle.

UTAH

Erastus F. Birch, Eureka.
Harold C. Nelson, North Salt Lake.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 1, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name give glory for Thy mercy and for Thy truth's sake. Thou wilt bless every good act and not allow any good thing to be forgotten. O God, help us to associate ourselves with great principles of truth and wisdom that shall bless generations to come. Inspire rectitude in the public conscience, and may the sense of justice and consistency grow strong in the social order. Continue to give us faith to endure and strength to stand patiently waiting for the disclosures of Thy providence. Bless us, our Heavenly Father, with a complete integrity of mind, and may there be not one rusted link in our mental armor, and thus safeguard us against failure and weakness. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MONETARY REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I do this solely because I know there is very great interest in the question that is before the Committee on Banking and Currency to do something toward the stabilization of the purchasing power of money. I know that too often we have the attitude of dismissing the subject of money legislation by saying that nothing can be done about it; that it is an evil that has come down to us through time; and that it is an evil that must endure.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, is of that same opinion, as will be noted from the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency in connection with the recent legislation enacted by the House.

In order to get this matter more squarely before the membership of the House I expect to address to each one of you a letter, and I will read that letter now:

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Won't you please read this letter?

Congress has been busy since December trying to devise credit schemes to bring the country out of its awful financial condition. All of these schemes are destined to fail because credit and loans will not meet the situation. Of the 40,000,000 people who could be gainfully employed, 8,000,000 are looking for work. They are out of jobs and in most instances all property has been taken from them. Recruits are fast joining their ranks. The annual national income has been reduced from $90,000,000,000 to less than $60,000,000,000 a year, and much of this loss of $30,000,000,000 has fallen on the laborers, the farmers, and those least able to bear it. They have ceased to be producers and therefore can not be consumers except at the hand of charity. The result is that profitable business is gone. Almost every railroad is losing money fast; steel production is at 25 per cent capacity, the lowest ever. Electric-power production is making a miserable showing. Power to consume is gone and business is following fast.

We might as well hope to end a drought with a lawn sprinkler as to try to end this depression by supplying credit and increasing debt without providing income and producing power. More debts piled on the people will only deepen their troubles later. What the people need is a fair price for the commodities they produce. Farm commodities, labor, and all other commodities produced must be lifted back to the level they were when the billions of dollars of debts were made. Congress must "regulate the value thereof" (money) so as to give the people honest currency and a stable dollar.

Let us not say, "That can not be done," until we have spent time and study on the subject. The constituents of every Member of Congress are in want and are in awful financial straits because we have failed to provide a plan to give them an opportunity to labor and have an income. Instead we are continually trying to arrange loans and get them further into debt.

I have given a great deal of study to this subject. I am convinced that the Congress can meet the requirements of the Constitution, "To coin money, regulate the value thereof," as the power was given us by the framers of the Constitution.

I am inclosing herewith three speeches dealing with these subjects:

First. An analysis of our deplorable financial condition and a discussion of some of the causes which have brought about that condition (delivered in the House December 19 last).

Second. A plan to stabilize the purchasing power of currency in relation to commodity prices, headed "Government Should Maintain Honest Dollars" (delivered in the House on February 15 last).

Third. Monetary reform legislation the true relief (delivered February 19 last).

Won't you please take the time to carefully read these discussions, not because they are a perfect presentation of the subject but that we (all Members working together) may evolve and set up a currency and credit system that will save our people from the recurring evils now upon them. Let's do our best to lay aside prejudices which enwrap us about the "money question" and try, through understanding, to scientifically work out the question logically.

The leading economists of this country and the world are convinced of its soundness. The famous statistician, Roger W. Babson, said, "Only those who do not understand it oppose it." A great number of Members of Congress understand and advocate the plan. The farm organizations are all demanding this legislation.

The House Committee on Banking and Currency will begin hearings on the question the 16th and 17th of this month. It is the hope of Members who have studied the question to have a meeting in the House Chamber of all Members of every political party and plan further efforts and arrangements to get such legislation. Interest in the subject of restoring the prices of commodities to a fair level is intense. Let us all understand and work together.

In conclusion, I feel that I should ask your pardon for intruding this letter and these speeches upon you. I assure you that my only purpose is to assist in a move to definitely cement forces for a cause and a plan to save our people. Now is the time to act. When a man is feeling well, even though he knows he has fundamental disorders, he is not inclined to submit to an operation or to medicine. It is only when he is in great pain or distress that he is willing to undertake these remedies. So it is in finance and business.

Sincerely yours,

JEFF BUSBY,
Member of the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. Speaker, I believe until we have done our best to supply the remedy for this situation that we should be held accountable by our people for the culpability that we have shown in not trying to meet it. I do not believe we are incapable of meeting our responsibility in this matter. [Applause.]

FIXING COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I call up a conference report on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement on the part of the managers of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"'Article —

"'SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"'SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"'SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"'SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"'SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.'"

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate resolution provides that the terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on January 15 and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on January 2. Under the House amendment the terms of President and Vice President end at noon on January 24 and those of Senators and Representatives at noon on January 4. The conference agreement provides that the terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on January 20 and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on January 3.

The Senate resolution provides that the regular sessions of Congress shall begin at noon on January 2. Under the House amendment January 4 is fixed as the day of meeting instead of January 2. The conference agreement fixes the time for meeting at noon on January 3.

The first sentence of section 3 of the Senate resolution provides that whenever the right to choose a President has devolved upon the House, and the House has not chosen a President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President shall act as President, "as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President." Under the corresponding provision of the House amendment (the first clause of the second sentence of section 3) the Vice President elect acts as President not only when the House has failed to choose a President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, but also in any case where, at that time, the President has failed to qualify for any reason. Under the House amendment it is made clear that in such a case the Vice President will act only until the House has chosen a President and he has qualified or until the President elect chosen by the Electoral College has qualified. The conference agreement retains the substance of the House provision with changes in phraseology.

The second sentence of section 3 of the Senate resolution gives Congress the power by law to declare what officer shall act as President in a case where the election of the President has devolved upon the House and that of the Vice President has devolved upon the Senate and neither the President nor the Vice President has been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of their terms. The officer who acts as President in such a case will act only until the House has chosen a President or the Senate has chosen a Vice President. The corresponding provision of the House amendment (the last clause of the second sentence of section 3) provides for the case wherein both the President elect and Vice President elect have, for any reason, failed to qualify at the time fixed for the beginning of their terms by giving Congress the power by law to declare who shall act as President in such case or to provide the manner in which a qualified person shall be selected. In such case the person who acts as President is to act only until a President or a Vice President has qualified. If, in such case, the Vice President elect should have qualified before a President has qualified, then, although he would act in place of the person acting under the law of Congress, he would act only until the House has chosen a President and he has qualified or until the President elect chosen by the Electoral College has qualified. The conference agreement retains the substance of the House provision with changes in phraseology.

The House amendment—first sentence of section 3—provides that if the President elect is dead at the time fixed for the beginning of his term, the Vice President elect becomes President. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate resolution. The conference agreement carries out the policy of the House resolution, with changes to make it clear that the Vice President elect becomes President only at the time fixed for the beginning of the term.

The House amendment—section 4—gives Congress the power by law to provide means by which a President or a Vice President may be selected, when the right of choice has devolved upon either body, if any of the persons from whom the House may choose a President or the Senate may choose a Vice President, as the case may be, has died. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate resolution. The House provision has been retained under the conference agreement, with minor changes in phraseology.

Under the Senate resolution the provisions relating to the contingencies with respect to the filling of the office of President take effect on the 15th of October following ratification, whereas under the House amendment such provisions take effect upon ratification. The conference agreement adopts the House provision. Under the Senate resolution the provisions relating to the terms of President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives and the provisions relating to the meeting day of Congress take effect on the 15th of October next following ratification, whereas under the House amendment such provisions take effect on the 30th of November of the year following the year of ratification. The conference agreement adopts the Senate provision.

Section 6 of the House amendment provides that the amendment shall be inoperative unless ratified within seven years from the date of submission of the proposed amendment to the States, and unless ratification is by legislatures the entire membership of at least one branch of which has been elected subsequent to the date of submission of the amendment to the States. There is no corresponding provision in the Senate resolution. The conference agreement retains the provision that the amendment shall be inoperative unless ratified within seven years from the date of submission to the States, but omits the provision relating to ratification by legislatures the membership of one branch of which has been elected subsequent to submission.

LAMAR JEFFERS,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
CHARLES L. GIFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the conference report was agreed to.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9699) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mechanical equipment: For installation and repair of mechanical equipment in all completed and occupied public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including heating, hoisting, plumbing, gas piping, ventilating, vacuum cleaning, and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, meters, interior pneumatic tube and intercommunicating telephone systems, conduit, wiring, call bell and signal systems, platform scales, and for maintenance and repair of tower clocks; for installation and repair of mechanical equipment for any of the foregoing items in buildings not reserved by vendors on sites under the control of the Treasury Department acquired for public buildings or the enlargements of public buildings, the total expenditures on this account for the current fiscal year not to exceed 10 per cent of the annual rentals of such buildings: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated not exceeding $125,000 may be used for the installation and repair of mechanical equipment in marine hospitals, the national leprosarium, and quarantine stations (including Marcus Hook), and not exceeding $38,000 for the Treasury, Treasury Annex, Liberty Loan, and Auditors' Buildings in the District of Columbia, but not including the generating plant and its maintenance in the Auditor's Building, and not exceeding $10,000 for changes in, maintenance of, and repairs to the pneumatic-tube systems in New York City installed under franchises of the city of New York approved June 29, 1909, and June 11, 1928, and the payment of any obligations arising thereunder, in accordance with the authority of the acts approved August 5, 1909 (36 Stat. 120), and May 15, 1928 (45 Stat. 533), authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts with the city of New York to abide by the terms, conditions, and requirements of said franchises: Provided further, That this sum shall not be available for the payment of personal services except for work done by contract, or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building, $775,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I notice in the paragraph just read a provision relating to repairs to the pneumatic-tube systems of New York City, which have been installed under certain franchises with the municipality. Years ago, when serving as a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I gave considerable attention to the pneumatic-tube service in connection with the transfer of the mails in the five leading cities of the country. Does this item refer to the transfer of the mails or is it the private pneumatic-tube service in our Government buildings?

Mr. BYRNS. These are the mail tubes in Government-owned buildings. We will come to the item in which the gentleman is interested a little later, I think.

Mr. STAFFORD. These are the private pneumatic tubes in the buildings proper for transferring by little cylinders mail or communications between the different parts of the building?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; in the Government-owned buildings. The pneumatic-tube service is carried in the Post Office Department appropriation bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Outside professional services: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain outside professional and/or technical services, as provided by the public buildings act approved May 25, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 40, sec. 342), and by the act approved March 31, 1930 (46 Stat. p. 137), and to pay reasonable compensation for such services, and to employ appraisers, when necessary, by contract or otherwise, $2,400,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of securing information from the chairman of the committee. The paragraph just read, relating to outside professional services and appropriating money to pay for the services so obtained, refers to certain acts heretofore passed, being the act approved May 25, 1926, the act approved May 31, 1930. I, of course, do not recall the provisions of those acts. The particular information that I am seeking is this: Does this authorize the employment of architects who do not have a civil-service status?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. It authorizes the employment of private architects within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, under the law cited the Acting Supervising Architect of the Treasury has authority to employ architects when, in his judgment, they are necessary, although they have no civil-service status.

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. My reason for asking these questions is that I have inquiries of that kind occasionally from architects, and I wanted some authoritative statement with reference to the matter.

Mr. BYRNS. Those architects, the gentleman will understand, are usually employed in the case of the larger buildings, or when a congestion arises making it necessary to secure plans and specifications in order to speed up the work. Of course, it is done by contract.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Supervising Architect have discretion to employ them for any special length of time?

Mr. BYRNS. They are employed to draw plans for a particular building by contract, and they do not do anything with reference to the supervision of the work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How is their compensation fixed? Is it by contract?

Mr. BYRNS. By contract; yes. They only draw the plans and specifications. They do not do any of the supervision. They have no supervision of the building itself, because that is done by civil-service employees. The amount paid is usually 4.8 per cent. I will say to the gentleman, in further explanation, that the statement was made in the hearings that there are in the hands of private architects 156 projects, drawings for which are now being prepared, the total limit of cost being $124,775,023.22. As the gentleman knows, 6 per cent is the usual fee paid to architects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Six per cent of the contract price?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They are not paid a salary but are paid on a percentage basis with reference to the cost of construction?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. That percentage is usually about 4.8 per cent and for this reason: The architect is not expected to follow the building on to construction, but, of course, he is available for consultation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. So such an architect gets less than an architect employed in connection with private buildings?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How long has the Supervising Architect had the discretion to employ these architects?

Mr. BYRNS. Since 1926.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, at the time of the passage of the general building act certain provisions were made for the employment of outside skill, but that with reference to technical and architectural services was incorporated subsequently in an amendment to that act, passed, as I recall, in 1930. Since that time the Supervising Architect of the Treasury has been authorized to employ outside architects in the construction of Federal buildings.

There is now pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a bill to make permanent this discretionary power in the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. Some of the bills which have been introduced on that subject even go so far as to make that provision mandatory where a building costs more than $50,000. Hearings have been held upon those various measures and the committee will soon act thereon in executive session.

I will further state to the gentleman that the Supervising Architect's Office, of course, has architects employed in its regular personnel who plan the buildings that cost the smaller amounts, because in some respects those buildings are more or less standardized. When architects are employed in the construction of the larger and monumental buildings, which necessarily vary in many of their features, they are paid in accordance with a sliding scale, dependent upon the total cost of construction. The testimony before the committee showed that where outside architects were employed the general average of cost was 4.8 per cent, whereas when the work was done in the department the cost was about 2.7 per cent.

It seems that the present authority of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury or, rather, of the Treasury Department, to employ outside architects is coextensive in time with the present building program. However, as I say, measures are pending to make that the permanent policy, and it seems the authorities of the Treasury Department are of the opinion that that should be done, because it speeds up building and allows more work to be completed, but they think it should be discretionary and not mandatory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Of course, the cost is greater when private architects are employed, but, as the gentleman says, these architects are employed in order to expedite construction, and, of course, I imagine expedition in construction would save some cost, because the architect's fees are only a small portion of the cost of construction.

Mr. LANHAM. Of course, on monumental buildings the architects' fees amount to quite a sum of money. However, it does facilitate the work. The Treasury Department made the statement before the committee that it was not its desire to build up a big organization here, for which there would be no use after the lapse of the present building program.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. BYRNS, and my colleague, Mr. LANHAM, who is chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for this information.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, OPERATING EXPENSES

Operating force: For such personal services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary in connection with the care, maintenance, and repair of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department (except as hereinafter provided), together with the grounds thereof and the equipment and furnishings therein, including inspectors of buildings, repairs and equipment, assistant custodians, janitors, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen; telephone operators for the operation of telephone switchboards or equivalent telephone switchboard equipment in Federal buildings, jointly serving in each case two or more governmental activities; engineers, firemen, elevator conductors, coal passers, electricians, dynamo tenders, lampists, and wiremen; mechanical labor force in connection with said buildings, including carpenters, plumbers, steam fitters, machinists, and painters, but in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed, $10,495,000: Provided, That the foregoing appropriation shall be available for use in connection with all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including the customhouse in the District of Columbia, but not including any other public building in the District of Columbia, and exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 42, line 15, I move to strike out the word "public," a pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the public is concerned regarding every action taken by either branch of Congress. On Thursday of last week there was placed on the Speaker's desk a petition to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from consideration of a resolution designed to repeal the eighteenth amendment.

There was a spectacular rush from the floor, led by our friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], to sign this petition. From the manner of the rush and the crowding of the well of the House one would have imagined the entire House of Representatives was wet as the deep blue sea and that the petition would be signed immediately; but our friends—and they are our friends—since last Thursday have searched the highways and byways to get signatures to this petition, and only after this long search are they able to produce the 145 signatures necessary. This is the first interval that the House of Representatives has had from wet speeches from Thursday to the present time, because all of the activities of our wet Members have been exerted to get the required 145 signatures to this petition. Notwithstanding Thursday has passed and Friday and Saturday and Sunday and Monday and part of Tuesday, they have not yet had the petition signed by a sufficient number of Members. They still lack one signature, which they will have in a few minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why does not the gentleman sign it?

Mr. BLANTON. This just shows that the House of Representatives is not wet, for it is composed of 435 Members. This is a mere gesture. Our friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] and our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] and our friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], all leaders of the wets, know that they will not get enough votes to pass the discharge rule because in order to pass it on the floor of this House and to bring the resolution up for consideration there must be a majority of the Members voting, a quorum being present, to make the resolution in order.

This is a mere gesture to embarrass some of their friends, both wet and dry. What is going to be accomplished by it? Nothing! I happen to have in my pocket here a resolution passed in their national convention here by the educators of the United States—the teachers, if you please, who teach the youth of the land. When they met here while this very petition was under process of being signed they passed this resolution:

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more, to read the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the gentleman's amendment afterwards.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. The resolution is as follows:

The department of superintendence urges teachers to continue to impart respect for the Constitution of the United States and for all of its various amendments.

We urge the enforcement of the entire Constitution of the United States as the supreme law of the land, and we reaffirm our belief in the principles of the eighteenth amendment and in the habits of life and conduct which it is intended to inculcate.

This resolution I have just read was passed by the teachers of the United States. It comes from those who train your children, and it is the mothers and the fathers of the children of the land who are going to stand between you and any impairment of the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, any time that this House has the experience of seeing the distinguished gentleman from Texas get unduly excited we may know that it is because he becomes panicky on the eve of a defeat. I submit to the gentleman from Texas, in all kindliness, that it is no idle gesture when 145 Members of this House, representing over 40,000,000 citizens, petition the Congress to consider a proposition to let the people of this country reconsider the matter of the repeal of an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The petition is now closed and will be recorded in the Journal and the RECORD. One hundred and forty-five signatures are now on the petition. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy that I was on the floor when this great moment arrived, and I am doubly happy that the last man to sign the petition was a distinguished son of the State of Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD]. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on Friday last I asked unanimous consent that this petition be taken to the Naval Hospital to be signed by my colleague from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. When I made that request, after consultation with many Members, it was not thought possible that anybody here would object to granting this courtesy to a colleague, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] did object. May I say further that we brought in here to-day a gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN], who had to be helped into the Chamber, to sign this petition, because so anxious was he to affix his name to this scroll that he was willing to risk his very life in doing what he considered to be his conscientious duty. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That indicates the state of mind and the attitude of the gentleman from Texas. He would not object to a request of that kind on any other proposition which did not involve prohibition. Supporters of prohibition apparently will not reason but are moved by emotion and fanaticism whenever the subject is discussed.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Texas, as long as he is here and a Member of this House, is going to demand that all legislative acts be transacted here in the House of Representatives and not off somewhere in New York or Texas or Washington.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that there is no more sacred duty than taking the oath of office in the well of this House, and yet we have by unanimous consent permitted the oath of office to be taken by sick Members outside of the Hall of the House. In this instance it was the mere signing of a petition.

Mr. BLANTON. But this was a legislative step, a legislative act. When the request was made to permit signing in a hospital I said:

Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have the kindliest of feeling for both gentlemen from New York, the one in the hospital and the one making the request, but I think that establishes a very unwise precedent, and I object. The motion to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the consideration of a resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States is a crucial step toward legislation than which there is none other more serious and important. The signing of such motion is a legislative act, and the floor of this House is the place for all such legislative acts to be transacted. To establish such an unwise precedent might lead to others even more important. I regret that I must object to the request.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, we have arrived at a time when we must reason, when we must discuss this question of prohibition normally, clearly, and rationally, and not under the fanaticism of the past. [Applause.] The condition of the country is such that the question must be decided. The eighteenth amendment has not brought about the condition which the gentleman read from the resolution. We must continue the fight until the question is properly settled, until we can by a proper constitutional and legislative channel bring about the control of liquor under the Government and not continue the universal disregard and contempt of law, with its corollary of crime and corruption, all created by prohibition. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Having had one speech for and one speech against, I hope Members will reserve all speeches on prohibition until we conclude this bill.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Operating supplies: For fuel, steam, gas for lighting and heating purposes, water, ice, lighting supplies, electric current for lighting, heating, and power purposes, telephone service for custodial forces; removal of ashes and rubbish, snow, and ice; cutting grass and weeds, washing towels, and miscellaneous items for the use of the custodial forces in the care and maintenance of completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof under the control of the Treasury Department, and in the care and maintenance of the equipment and furnishings in such buildings; miscellaneous supplies, tools, and appliances required in the operation (not embracing repairs) of the mechanical equipment, including heating, plumbing, hoisting, gas piping, ventilating, vacuum-cleaning and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, meters, interior pneumatic tube and intercommunicating telephone systems, conduit wiring, call bell and signal systems in such buildings, and for the transportation of articles or supplies authorized herein (including the customhouse in the District of Columbia, but excluding any other public building under the control of the Treasury Department within the District of Columbia, and excluding also marine hospitals and quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, and personal services, except for work done by contract or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building), $3,901,500. The appropriation made herein for gas shall include the rental and use of gas governors when ordered by the Secretary of the Treasury in writing: Provided, That rentals shall not be paid for such gas governors greater than 35 per cent of the actual value of the gas saved thereby, which saving shall be determined by such tests as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to contract for telephone service in public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department by means of telephone switchboards or equivalent telephone-switching equipment jointly serving in each case two or more Government activities where he finds that joint service is economical and in the interest of the Government, and to secure reimbursement for the cost of such joint service from available appropriations for telephone expenses of the bureaus and offices receiving the same.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this in order to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. This item appropriates for gas, including the rental and use of gas governors. Then the proviso reads:

That rentals shall not be paid for such gas governors greater than 35 per cent of the actual value of the gas saved thereby.

Is not this a rather unusual provision in an appropriation bill?

Mr. BYRNS. I can only say to the gentleman that it has been in the bill for a very long time. My particular attention was never called to it before. I only know that it has been carried in the bill, without objection, for many years. It is simply a limitation on the amount that shall be paid for rental.

Mr. TILSON. Undoubtedly it was put in originally for some good purpose, and I do not now object to it; but I was interested in the matter because of the unusual language of the provision. It probably is not important.

Mr. BYRNS. I really can not give the gentleman any information on that, except, as I say, it has been a part of the bill for many years.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Supervising Architect: Salaries: For the Supervising Architect, and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $694,880.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask the indulgence of the members of the committee while I call attention to the occupancy of some of the public buildings here in the city of Washington. There were two or three things which influenced the Committee on Appropriations in limiting the amount to be expended out of this appropriation for next year to $15,000,000 in the District of Columbia. The proposition first was to appropriate $120,000,000, about $22,000,000 of which was to be expended in the District. The committee felt that that was a much greater percentage than ought to be allowed for the District, in comparison with what was being appropriated for the 48 States in the Union; and, even as reduced to $15,000,000, the District of Columbia is getting a very good share on a pro rata basis.

The Congress has been speeding up these District buildings, and I have no criticism to make of that. There was another reason which influenced the committee and that was that it wanted to be sure in the future as to just what was going to be done with these buildings after they are completed. I remember, and I am sure other gentlemen will recall seeing in a supplement of one of the Sunday newspapers a picture of this magnificent apex building, which is excluded from this appropriation, published some two or three months ago. It is a beautiful building, and it ought to be a beautiful building, because it is the key to all of this building program in the District. It was said that it was to be occupied by the Coast Guard and the Federal Park and Planning Commission, and some other commission, which has to do with the distribution of office space here in the District of Columbia. I think we can not criticize the Park and Planning Commission for proposing to establish itself in beautiful and luxurious quarters in that building, but I am sure we all agree that these buildings ought to be utilized in the first instance for real, genuine permanent activities of the Government, which are now occupying rented quarters.

Let me call attention for a moment to the new Commerce Building. When that building was erected, we were told it was being made of sufficient size to take care of future increases in the Department of Commerce for at least 10 years or more. The Department of Commerce was moved into that building on January 1. They immediately spread out all over the building and took possession of the entire space and are now occupying it, notwithstanding the fact it was built with the idea that it would be large enough to take care of increases for 10 years or more. As I say, they have spread out all over that building, while there are other activities, such as the Federal Radio Commission and many others I could name, which are occupying expensive rented quarters here in the District. I had occasion to call attention of at least two members of the Public Building Commission to that fact, and they told me it was the intention to move the Radio Commission into that building. I asked why they did not do the sensible thing and move them in there on January 1, when they moved the Department of Commerce. I said, "You have spread the Department of Commerce throughout the building now, and you are going to have a difficult time getting one official, who now has one room all to himself to double up with somebody else, whereas if you had exercised what I believe would have been ordinary common judgment, you would have set apart whatever was necessary for the Department of Commerce, and said that you were going to put the Radio Commission or some other commission in there." I was assured by both of those gentlemen that possibly that would have been the better way to have done it, but that they were ultimately going to put some other activities in there. I predict, however, that unless there is pressure brought you will never see any other activity in that Commerce Building save the Department of Commerce. I have a statement here which was prepared, and which I shall ask permission to insert into the RECORD, showing just what the present space of the Department of Commerce is in the new building, and what its space was in other buildings before it moved on January 1. I am not going into a description of that building. You gentlemen know something about it. It cost $17,500,000.

I am not sure whether there are 3,000 or 3,300 rooms in the building, but each room in that building cost possibly $5,000. It is a magnificent building and one of which we all can be proud, with its walnut panels, its big conference rooms, one of which, I am told, will seat 1,000 people, and other conference rooms scattered here and there, with private elevators, one of them for the exclusive use of the Secretary of Commerce, so the newspaper says, costing $6.34 every day. I think there has been the grossest sort of extravagance in the erection of that building, but that is not what I rise to complain of at this time. The building has been erected and the money has been expended, but it is a question of what use is going to be made of the building from now on, as to whether we are going to put some activities in there and save some of this enormous rent that we expected to save when we started this public-buildings program in the District of Columbia. The old space occupied by the Commerce Department, exclusive of the Bureau of Standards, and, of course, that bureau is going to be continued out on Connecticut Avenue and is properly excluded, was 1,015,534 square feet. The present space occupied by the Department of Commerce in the new building since January 1 is 1,093,450 square feet. Of that 1,015,534 square feet of old space 386,946 square feet were for the Census Office, both permanent and temporary. Of course we know that every 10 years they increase the employees of the Census Office and must have a great deal more space, but with the exception of the two or three years in every decennial period the permanent organization is much smaller. The space in the new building for the permanent census force is 191,950 square feet.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. How much space is taken up by private elevators to carry certain friends up to see different bureau chiefs?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know, but I am sure they have plenty. When you exclude the Census Office from both old and new space what are the figures? The old space occupied by the Department of Commerce is 628,588 square feet.

To-day they have 901,500 square feet in this new building, exclusive of the Census, or an increase over what they had prior to January 1 of 272,912 square feet. The number of employees in both cases is approximately the same. Not a single new activity has been added since January 1, yet the Department of Commerce to-day, adequately supplied with space before January 1, with no complaint from any source that they were crowded, has 272,912 square feet more than it had on January 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman spoke of there being no new activities. Is not the Bureau of Fisheries to be housed in this building?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. I am glad to be corrected by the gentleman. The Bureau of Fisheries is there, but I think they have their splendid aquarium, equipped at the expense of many, many thousands of dollars, down in the basement, and not in the office quarters of the building.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. It is reported that this new building contains a dining room, a private dining room for the Secretary of Commerce. Is that true or not?

Mr. BYRNS. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. I want to call the attention of the House to the space occupied by these various activities. This is not the total number of square feet that I shall give you, but this is the approximate increase in the new building over what it was prior to the removal to the new building excluding the Bureau of Standards and the Census Office.

The increase of space in the offices occupied by the executives of the department amounts to 8,000 square feet. The increase of space occupied by other employees amounts to 172,000 square feet. The increase of space occupied by special equipment is 25,000 square feet. The increase of space occupied for storage purposes is 7,500 square feet. The increase of space occupied by restaurants in the building is 23,000 square feet. The increase of space occupied for miscellaneous purposes, such as furnace rooms, shops, library, research rooms, and so forth, amounts to 47,000 square feet. The increase of space for files is 400 square feet.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have risen simply to call attention to these facts. I think the Public Buildings Commission ought to take into consideration the fact that when the Government is spending millions of dollars in putting up these new buildings, it has done so with the intention that rent should be saved to those activities of the Government in private quarters, and if we are going to spend $17,500,000 for the purpose of erecting a building for one department and give it 273,000 square feet more than it had occupied, it seems to me we are going a long way. That was one reason which influenced this committee in feeling that until we had some assurance from those in charge of these public buildings in the District of Columbia, as far as we were concerned we were not going to recommend the erection of a single other new building, the apex building or any other building. [Applause.] That is the reason there is carried in this bill a provision that not a cent of this appropriation shall be spent upon the construction of the apex building, which has not yet been started.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. HARE. Is the attitude of the committee responsible for the Interdepartmental Building Committee to send up an installment for public buildings at this session of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. HARE. Is it not a fact that the committee has not sent up an installment for public buildings at this session of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. That is true.

Mr. HARE. Does the chairman know whether or not an installment will be sent before the close of this session?

Mr. BYRNS. My information is that the sixth installment will be sent up in December, but it has no relation to this.

Mr. HARE. Not before December next?

Mr. BYRNS. That is my information.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. In regard to the Commerce Building, another unfortunate feature is the fact that if it is found they have too much space now and are required to contract their activities for other commissions, like the Radio Commission, it means extra expense in reconstructing the interior for that purpose?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman may be right. In addition to the trouble of getting them to agree to contract their space.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. McMILLAN. As I understand the gentleman's remarks, it seems that the Public Buildings Commission is the agency of the Government responsible for the assignment of these various departments. Is it possible for the gentleman or his committee to build a fire of some kind under that Public Buildings Commission? It seems to me that is the responsible agency.

Mr. BYRNS. I am just trying to set one now.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the gentleman will, because it seems to me that is where the fire is needed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject by inserting this table.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I desire at this time to call attention to H. R. 8167, for I have been advised by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that arrangements will be made within the next few days to conduct hearings on the bill. It reads as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That section 27 of the Federal Farm Loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, secs. 941-943), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any person having obtained a loan from a Federal land bank or a joint-stock land bank may buy and sell farm-loan bonds issued by the mortgagee bank, and any such bank is authorized and directed to accept such bonds at par value when presented by a mortgagor in payment of any installment due under a mortgage, or in full satisfaction of a mortgage after it has been in full force and effect for a period of five years: Provided, That where a mortgage has been foreclosed and the mortgagee bank was the purchaser at the foreclosure sale and still has title to the property, the mortgagor shall have the right to purchase and tender such bonds in full satisfaction of the mortgage indebtedness and redeem said lands, the bank being required to execute deed for same.

You will see the bill provides that Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks will be required to accept their bonds when presented by a mortgagor, in satisfaction of an amortization installment due, or in satisfaction of a mortgage in full. The purpose of this bill is to give farmers who have borrowed money from any of the land banks the right to purchase and present bonds to a Federal land bank, or a joint-stock land bank, in satisfaction of a mortgage held by such a bank. That is, if a bank should hold a bond against which I have borrowed $10,000 and you are willing to sell the bond for $3,500, this bill if enacted into law would give me the right to purchase the bond and present it to the bank in satisfaction of my mortgage.

I introduced this bill last year and was assured of a hearing, but it was not reached.

I have information to the effect that the banks will not accept these bonds in satisfaction of a mortgage when presented by a mortgagor, but the banks do, whenever an opportunity arises, go into the market and buy the bonds and the difference between what the land sells for in case of a foreclosure and what they have paid for the bonds is placed to the credit of the bank. In other words, if a condition should arise where I would be unable to meet my installment and the bank holds a $10,000 mortgage against me, it will foreclose my mortgage.

The land may be bought by the bank or it may be bought by some other person for, we will say, $7,000. The bank goes into the market, buys the bond for $3,500, and takes the difference between the $3,500 and the $7,000 and places it to its credit. I feel there would be no injury to the bank and there would be no injury to anyone if a mortgagor under such circumstances were permitted to buy and present the bond in payment of his mortgage prior to the foreclosure. I believe it would be only fair and just to permit a mortgagor to do this. I believe he ought to be allowed to do it. There would be no injury to the bank, as I see it; there would be no loss to the bank and there would be no loss to anyone except the bondholder, and he does not have to sell if he does not want to.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does the bill include the Federal land banks?

Mr. HARE. It includes both classes of banks, although this can be done under existing law in case of a Federal land bank, provided the bond or bonds are presented by the association of which the mortgagor is a member.

Mr. GARBER. Would it require the banks to accept the bonds whether they were due or not?

Mr. HARE. Yes; of course. Permit me to say that since I introduced this bill a number of interested farmers have written me to the effect that it is the policy of some of these banks to foreclose mortgages upon the failure of a mortgagor to promptly meet his installments and buy outstanding bonds at a lower price than that for which the lands are bought at foreclosure. They say that the bonds are purchased in the name of some individual connected with the bank who places the bonds in the assets of the institution at a value equal to that paid for the land, "pocketing" the difference. Personally, I am unable to concede of such irregularity and can not help but think that representatives of the Farm Board would be able to detect such transactions and see to it that such practices are not allowed. However, I brought the matter to the attention by way of a letter to the Federal Farm Board January 15, 1932; having received no report or acknowledgment of the letter, I wrote again on February 11, calling attention to my request. On yesterday I had a telephone message advising that I would have a report sometime shortly.

I feel quite sure the Federal Farm Loan Board will oppose the proposed legislation. On what grounds I am unable to thoroughly understand. There may be some good reason, but so far I have not been able to see it. There seems to be no doubt but what a bank can, under the law, foreclose a mortgage and then go into the market and purchase a bond or bonds sufficient to offset same, even though the bonds may not yet be due. The bank, as I understand, is then the holder of the bond and has thereby liquidated the liability to the bondholder to that extent; that is, the transaction seems to be completed. To illustrate my idea:

Suppose a farmer 10 years ago filed an application with a joint-stock land bank for $10,000 and the application was approved. The bank would then issue and sell a bond sufficient to get $10,000 and lend same to the farmer. The bank would have a mortgage in the amount of $10,000 given by the farmer. The bondholder would have a $10,000 bond issued by the bank, and the farmer would have the $10,000 obtained from the bondholder through the bank. The farmer becomes liable to the bank for so much per annum, and the bank is liable for a certain amount to the bondholder. There comes a time when the farmer is unable to pay the annual installment due on his mortgage. The bank refuses to extend the time and proceeds to foreclose the mortgage. At the sale the bank becomes the purchaser of the land, we will say, for $5,000. In the meantime the market value of the bond held by the bondholder has decreased as much probably as the value of the land, and the boldholder offers the $10,000 bond for, say, $3,500, the bank becomes the purchaser and wipes out a $10,000 liability less the amounts paid in the meantime. Now, if the farmer had had the right to have bought the bond from the bondholder at the price he offered to sell, say, $3,500, and then delivered same to the bank in satisfaction of his mortgage, it seems to me that the bank having the mortgage in its possession could then wipe out its liability just as easily and in the same manner as it could if the bank had purchased the bond from the bondholder in the first instance. It appears to me that the farmer or the mortgagor should have the right to buy the bond and satisfy the liability of the bank with it in the same manner and to the same extent accorded the bank. The purpose of this bill is to give the mortgagor that right. There can be no reason why the farmer should not be allowed to avail himself of the right to purchase and use these bonds in this time of business depression or at any other time to the same extent that the banks are allowed to purchase and use them.

I want to say in conclusion this is one bill, if passed, that will give some relief to the farmers who borrowed money through our land banks, because if reports are true, none of the legislation enacted within the past 60 days has brought any relief to that class of farmers who have borrowed money from Federal land banks or joint-stock land banks, even though it was declared here time and time again that the legislation was designed to give relief to the land banks and to agriculture.

I hope that I may secure the cooperation and support of the Members of the House in an effort to secure the passage of this bill. I hope you will find it possible to appear before the Banking and Currency Committee when the date set for the hearings is fixed.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. I think the gentleman has an excellent idea, and I believe his bill should be enacted soon. I wonder what the prospect is of its being reported out of committee.

Mr. HARE. The chairman of the committee has gone no farther than to say he will give a hearing on the bill at an early date.

Mr. HASTINGS. When is the hearing to be held?

Mr. HARE. The chairman says the date will be fixed within the next few days.

Mr. HASTINGS. No definite date has been fixed?

Mr. HARE. Not at present.

Mr. Chairman, if I had the time, I would like to go farther and explain the provisions of another bill before the Banking and Currency Committee, which I hope will receive consideration before this Congress adjourns.

The bill I refer to is H. R. 5125, which would protect the depositors against losses in both State and National banks as well as other types of banking institutions. To my mind there is no piece of legislation that would contribute more toward reviving business and restoring confidence than a law that would insure bank depositors against losses. I think we could have taken not more than 10 per cent of the money appropriated or authorized to be appropriated within the past 60 days to meet what is called an emergency, to restore confidence and to revive business activity, and made a more successful job out of it by insuring bank deposits than will follow from the use and expenditure of the billion of dollars referred to. My impression is that the money appropriated will be used and give some temporary relief, but, unless steps are taken to insure deposits in banking institutions, there is to be no permanent relief from the standpoint of reviving and continuing business to any great extent or with any degree of success.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BYRNS] should be congratulated, not only by the House but by the entire country, for the splendid service he is rendering to the House and to the Nation.

Years ago various gentlemen, being sincerely interested in bringing about economy, recommended the construction of new structures and buildings so as to eliminate the excessive rents the Government has been paying in the District of Columbia. I do not have the figures before me, but I do know that the amount which the Government is paying out for rentals runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. However, I find it difficult to understand, with the construction of so many large buildings, why we are still paying these exorbitant rentals to the owners of some of these buildings in the District of Columbia.

I am not going to charge criminal neglect on the part of the commission, but I do say it is high time for this House to put a stop to these methods and to start economizing, not by a reduction of the salaries paid to the employees, but by eliminating unnecessary expenditures such as these; the result would be a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars uselessly paid out for rentals, inasmuch as we have buildings ready, especially the expensive buildings which we have erected in the last few years, in which we can house every department.

Before I conclude I desire, Mr. Chairman, to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee. I notice that there is an appropriation of $694,880 for the Supervising Architect and that it provides for personnel services in the District of Columbia. Does that include the fees paid to architects in the office and to those who have been engaged by the Supervising Architect for the preparation of plans and specifications and for the supervision of the construction of buildings in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BYRNS. No; it does not. It only applies to architects in his office who are under civil service. It does not apply to private architects.

Mr. SABATH. Is there any chance of obtaining information as to how much money has been paid to various architects in the last three years under the Hoover administration?

Mr. BYRNS. It is fully set out in the hearings, and I can give it to the gentleman in a moment if he wishes it.

Mr. SABATH. I would like to have these figures, because a great many complaints are being made in regard to the excessive fees allowed to architects who have been engaged by the Supervising Architect. I am not going to say that these fees are unreasonable, but I have received many complaints to the effect that only politically favored, and by no means specially fitted, architects receive any consideration, and that the outstanding architects of the country are completely ignored. In the future I expect to address the House in regard to the information that has come to my notice as to why and how certain contractors, who have been receiving the contracts for all of these buildings, and architects are being engaged, and also as to their connections.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mrs. OWEN) Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Martin, of the Treasury Department, made the statement to the committee that up to December 9, 1931, we had contracts with private architects for 217 projects, and the total obligations up to December 1, 1931, for those 217 projects, including an estimated amount for travel, amounted to $11,329,264.98. That is the total amount of obligations and money paid up to December 1, 1931.

Mr. SABATH. On the projects under construction?

Mr. BYRNS. All projects on which private architects have been employed up to December 1, 1931.

Mr. SABATH. And that amounts to $11,329,264.98?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. The gentleman understands, of course, that that applies to private architects who have been employed in the past, not only here in the District but throughout the country.

Mr. SABATH. During the past fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS. It is for all the years that have passed up to December 1, 1931. That is the total amount.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is not on the present construction, but up to date?

Mr. BYRNS. It is the cash paid and obligations incurred.

Mr. SABATH. What does that include? Does it take in the last four years or six years, or does that represent all the time in the past?

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman it is really all in the last two or three years.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I desired to know. So this amount of $11,329,264 has been expended in the last two or three years with private architects, in addition to the sum that we are now appropriating for the department.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Would the gentleman put along with those figures the volume of work that has been done as a result of the payment of these fees? As I understand the fees are the same as those paid to any other architect that one may employ, 2 or 3 per cent for the plans and 2 or 3 per cent for supervision of construction. I understand these are the same fees that are paid architects all over the country and I think if the gentleman would add to his figures the volume of work that has been accomplished, it would be instructive. Can the gentleman do that?

Mr. SABATH. If I can get that information, I shall gladly embody it in my remarks, but my attention has been called to this situation, and I was under the impression that the amount provided here was not sufficient to take care of all the construction and therefore I asked the question of the chairman, feeling that $694,000 would not suffice for all this work, and I was right, because I now receive the information that the amount which has been paid out is $11,329,264.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will refer to page 41 of the bill he will find there an appropriation of $2,400,000 which is made especially to take care of outside, professional services.

Mr. SABATH. I overlooked this, due to the fact that just about that time the gentleman from Texas moved to strike out the "public" from the bill so as to make a prohibition speech, and my thoughts were distracted from this important proposition.

Of course, I realize the gentleman from Texas did not gain anything and will not gain anything, because the people of the Nation are ready, willing, and desirous, and are appealing to Congress to change the prohibition law. So, therefore, anything that the gentleman may say on the floor from now on will not avail him, and I am mighty glad that he only speaks for those who are not well informed, because all of the well-informed people realize and recognize that the people of the country have had enough of this foolish, unwise legislation, and that they are now demanding real relief from existing conditions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I want to further enlarge the picture given you by our chairman with respect to this extravagant Department of Commerce Building.

Our chairman, in speaking of the fact that there was ample space there to have provided offices for our Reconstruction Finance Corporation, failed to tell you that General Dawes paid $70,000 rent for his offices in the old building, and this is in addition to such furnishings as he is buying at the expense of the people and the Government.

Our chairman, because he is more courteous than I am to these bureau chiefs down here, failed to tell you that the land itself on which this $17,500,000 building was constructed is valued at $30,000,000.

The gentleman from Tennessee failed to tell you that in order to construct this great, tremendous palace of an office building down there they demolished good, substantial, stone and brick buildings of the value of several hundred thousand dollars. They demolished them and paid a large amount, in certain instances, to have them torn down and moved away. This is part of the picture of this terrible extravagance.

The gentleman from Tennessee failed to tell you that in the hearings before his committee it was shown that one of the most important bureaus in that department, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, that should have at its head a man intimately familiar with the business of the department—the gentleman failed to tell you that on July 1 last the Secretary of that department placed at the head of this important Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce a man who has never had any connection whatever with the department since way back in 1924, when he was a $2,200 secretary under Secretary Hoover. He was on July 1, 1931, placed in charge of this important bureau—a former $2,200 clerk, if you please—at a salary of $8,000, and his salary this year will be $9,000.

Mr. SABATH. And that is economy.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the economy of this present most extravagant administration that the country has ever witnessed.

No wonder we find distinguished men like Merle Thorpe, editor of Nation's Business, in his radio address the other night telling Congress that the business men of this Nation demand retrenchment, telling Congress that they are tired of promises and want retrenchment. Our friend the gentleman from Tennessee is giving this to them. With the passage of this bill his committee will have cut down the President's Budget estimates on the bills thus far passed almost $100,000,000. [Applause.] Is not that a saving for the people of the country? I want to tell Mr. Merle Thorpe that if he will get the business men of the Nation to require the other small part of the Congress to back up this House we will make some retrenchments under the splendid leadership of the gentleman from Tennessee that will help to balance the Budget.

The great trouble is that we make retrenchments in the bills here and then they go somewhere else and are enlarged.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure my good friend from Indiana is not going to uphold the extravagance of this department?

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Does the gentleman know that there are 149 employees of the Department of Commerce abroad who get as high as $8,000 a year and expenses?

Mr. BLANTON. I know that the traveling expenses which many of the employees of the department are getting are outrageous and that many receive as much for traveling expenses a year as their salary amounts to. Just think of it. I wish you would check up the salaries and traveling expenses that are paid these employees since the classification act was passed. You would find that they have raised $2,200 clerks to so-called bureau chiefs with a salary of eight or nine thousand dollars. It is outrageous. We must repeal this classification act before this Congress adjourns.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I know a little something about this Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which the gentleman from Texas has been talking about. Of course we are all for economy. The gentleman from Texas has described some of the abuses without depicting the whole picture.

I want to tell you of a situation that arose in my district. I recently received a letter from some business men in Norfolk. This was sent me voluntarily without any thought of this kind, but the Department of Commerce has improved the conditions in Hampton Roads so that it has increased the receipts $250,000 in the last six months. That was done by the head of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Now, you do not want a $2,100 man at the head of a bureau of this kind. Yet a man of this kind, with the responsibilities that go with it, in the foreign-trade department, if you get one for eight or nine thousand dollars you are getting him very cheap.

I know something about the work, and I want to say to you that it requires a man of experience and an able man.

Mr. BLANTON. And yet the gentleman knows that factories are closed up all over the United States, and that the heads of 7,000,000 families are walking the streets unable to find jobs.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes; and the same conditions are true in Europe.

Mr. BLANTON. The Department of Commerce is not doing very much for them.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I have just given the gentleman an instance where it improved conditions, and receipts $250,000 in the last six months—is not that worth doing?

Mr. BLANTON. That probably would have occurred anyway, without any Department of Commerce.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, it seems to me that the present condition in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is emphasized at this time.

The truth is that when it was easy to sell American goods, when Europe was not manufacturing, and the world had to buy from the United States, the Bureau of Foreign Commerce took all the credit for the exportation which really we could not help. Now, anyone can sell goods when there is no competition, but it takes a real salesman to sell goods when there is real and keen competition.

I do not think the fault is entirely with the representatives in foreign countries from the Department of Commerce. I think they are made ridiculous by the administration, in the bedtime stories of Dr. Julius Klein, who goes on the radio every week and sends out mimeographed copies of his speech over the United States, telling what the Department of Commerce is doing, and what the department expects to do. I think the Department of Commerce, except Doctor Klein, is making a serious effort to carry on its work and trying to be helpful.

The trouble is that it is the great doctor of the department who continues to oversell the Department of Commerce.

Doctor Klein has been talking over the radio for the last year or year and a half, and I have been listening to him attentively. Every week he tells us that the depression is over, or that if we will follow his suggestion of redecorating our homes, or changing the drainage pipes in them, it will so stimulate business that the depression will cease to be. A great deal of the criticism directed toward the Department of Commerce is due to this gentleman, who is a modern, twentieth century Baron von Munchausen. He tells the greatest fables of any man I have ever heard in public life. In former days, when I was in the Consular Service, this same activity was carried on by the Consular Service. In some of the larger cities they had commercial attachés, but whether we have them in the Department of Commerce or under the Department of State, it is a good thing to have intelligent, keen, live wires—representatives stationed abroad to keep manufacturers and exporters in this country informed of conditions. However, they can not perform miracles, and I submit that now is the time for the Department of Commerce to show its salesmanship, when it requires real salesmen to sell goods, and if they can not do it, then perhaps next time Congress will act upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Postmaster General, $15,000; for personal services in the office of the Postmaster General in the District of Columbia, $220,790; in all, $235,790.

Mr. PARSONS. Madam Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines for the purpose of asking a question of the committee. I want to know what the figures are for expenditures for public buildings within the District of Columbia, and for public buildings outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ARNOLD. For the fiscal year 1933 the expenditures in the District of Columbia are limited to $15,000,000. The amount carried in this bill will allow about $93,000,000 for use in the country outside the District. The Bureau of the Budget asked for something like $21,800,000 for use in the District of Columbia. The committee felt that at this particular time, with the conditions throughout the country as deplorable as they are, we could very well slow down on the construction program in the District of Columbia, and to that end we inserted a limitation preventing any work from being done on the reconstruction of the State, War, and Navy Building and on the apex building.

Mr PARSONS. What were the figures for the last fiscal year of expenditures in the District of Columbia, approximately, and expenditures on the building program outside of the District?

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman means for the fiscal year 1932?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. As I understand, about $10,000,000 for use in the District of Columbia in 1932, and something like $66,000,000 outside.

Mr. PARSONS. The $66,000,000 includes the appropriation expenditures for the post office in Chicago?

Mr. ARNOLD. A portion of it.

Mr. PARSONS. How much? Twenty-one million dollars?

Mr. ARNOLD. No; it is not all appropriated. Just the amount was appropriated that will be necessary to carry the work along during the 1932 fiscal year.

Mr. PARSONS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Accounts, $97,370, of which amount $50,000 shall be available only for temporary employees to carry out the provisions of section 15 of the act of May 29, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, sec. 702a), for the maintenance of individual records of civil-service retirement and disability fund deductions so far as they relate to employees of the Postal Service.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I note the presence now on the floor of our former distinguished colleague, Col. John Philip Hill, of Maryland, who was well known as the Rider of the Great White Charger of Baltimore. He having been the former leader of the "wets" in this House in the early days, I am wondering whether or not it would be in order for him to be given the privilege of signing this wet resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain such a request.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that the present distinguished occupant of the chair, Mrs. OWEN, is eminently correct in her ruling.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for the Post Office Department, including all of its bureaus, offices, institutions, and services located in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, $1,140,000.

Mr. PARSONS. Madam Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and the figures in line 7, page 49, for the purpose of calling to the attention of the House the contemplated building program of the sixth allotment of post-office buildings throughout the country. The statement was made by the chairman or some one on the floor a few moments ago that they expected that bill to be sent up in December. Of all of the relief measures we have had proposed in this House, there has not been a single one except the road proposition last Saturday that proposes to give employment to labor. We have tried to make economies on the appropriation bills, and I think it is only fair to the Members of this House and to the people throughout the country to take the savings that have been made on appropriation bills and apply them to the building program on projects outside of the District of Columbia. There are more than 100 projects in the country for which appropriations could be made at this time, whereby the organization planning Government buildings could work out the details, acquire title, draw the plans and specifications for buildings, and have them ready for construction on or after July 1, 1933. If this program is passed up now, and not enacted into law until the short session next December or perhaps some time next January or March, then the entire organization in the architect's office, gaining title, drawing plans and specifications, will have to be disbanded during the summer. It is very important that we have that measure now, and while it can not be placed on this bill I call it to the attention of the Members so that they may be checking the matter with the interdepartmental committee and using their influence to ask the administration to send that public-building program to the Congress before this session adjourns.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations hereinafter made for the field service of the Post Office Department, except as otherwise provided, shall not be expended for any of the purposes hereinbefore provided for on account of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the actual and necessary expenses of officials and employees of the Post Office Department and Postal Service, when traveling on official business, may continue to be paid from the appropriations for the service in connection with which the travel is performed, and appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 of the character heretofore used for such purposes shall be available therefor: Provided further, That appropriations hereinafter made, except such as are exclusively for payment of compensation, shall be immediately available for expenses in connection with the examination of estimates for appropriations in the field including per diem allowances in lieu of actual expenses of subsistence.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, in line 2, after the word "compensation," strike out the comma.

I have taken this opportunity to call attention to the importance of a little thing, namely, a comma. My remarks will be about a comma but will not be about this particular comma.

It will be recalled that on July 10, 1931, the so-called oleomargarine legislation became effective, which imposed a tax of 10 cents a pound upon oleomargarine, whenever it was colored beyond a certain very slight degree. Within the past year a contest has developed concerning that particular proposition, and one of the oleomargarine companies has gone into court, making a claim that by reason of the fact that the original law was written with certain punctuation, that they, by that very fact, were relieved of tax, the 10 cents per pound tax paid upon products made from vegetable oils, previous to July 10, 1931. That position was sustained by the United States Supreme Court. Therefore, here is a comma, that by its omission in the engrossed copy of a bill when written in 1886, may possibly mean millions of dollars in tax refund, because this one company has already filed a claim for $150,000 refund on account of an oleomargarine tax paid previous to the enactment of this oleomargarine law in 1931, which covers the period between 1886 and 1931.

An examination has been made of the report of the bill in 1886 as it came from both Senate and House committees. An examination has been made of the language of the bill and the punctuation as it was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1886. In each instance following the word "oil" in the phrase "vegetable oil," there is found a comma, but in some unaccountable way, when the engrossed copy of the bill was presented the comma was omitted between "oil" and "annatto," which is the following term, and the legal construction has centered upon the phrase "vegetable-oil annatto," as it finally appeared in the law of 1886. There is no such particular kind of annatto. Annatto is a vegetable coloring matter not directly connected with vegetable oils. The two are separate and distinct products. Because this phrase was used in the original law and it appears in that law with a hyphen and not a comma, it is construed to mean only coloring matter, and therefore during this long period vegetable oil could not be considered as one of the constituents of the manufacture of oleomargarine, and therefore the basis of the claim for refund.

The principal purpose of this rather extended explanation is to call the attention of every person upon the floor who is interested particularly in dairy products, to the fact that a rehearing is being petitioned for before the Supreme Court, in order to secure a new construction upon that very important item. I am sure that all of you who come from dairy districts will be interested to see that that particular matter is given a rehearing, and it is now up for consideration. I would ask you to just note the remarks made and, if you are interested, to get in touch with those who have the matter in charge, and add your request to that of others in support of such rehearing.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. Did not the hearings and the text show clearly the intent of Congress?

Mr. KETCHAM. The committee reports and CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certainly do. For the information of those who are now listening, may I say I have just examined the law as it now is, and the present law contains that same punctuation that was intended in the law of 1886. I mention it not only because of the importance of this proposition at the present time, but sometimes, when we think that little things do not amount to very much we may have some evidence as to what the omission of a comma in this particular instance may amount to. It may amount to tens of millions of dollars refund, if not corrected.

Mr. KETCHAM. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay a cash reward for any invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions for an improvement or economy in device, design, or process applicable to the Postal Service submitted by one or more employees of the Post Office Department or the Postal Service which shall be adopted for use and will clearly effect a material economy or increase efficiency, and for that purpose the sum of $1,500 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the sums so paid to employees in accordance with this act, shall be in addition to their usual compensation: Provided further, That the total amount paid under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $1,000 in any month or for any one invention or suggestion: Provided further, That no employee shall be paid a reward under this act until he has properly executed an agreement to the effect that the use by the United States of the invention, suggestion, or series of suggestions made by him shall not form the basis of a further claim of any nature upon the United States by him, his heirs, or assigns: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for no other purpose.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I wish to inquire of the chairman, if the Government recognizes this service, why we appropriate such a small amount as $1,500 for the reward of these employees and then stipulate that not more than $1,000 can be expended in any one month or for any one invention? It seems to me that with the thousands of employees, if it is worth while to make an appropriation at all, we should have a slightly larger appropriation, say, perhaps $5,000, or something of that sort, to reward these employees.

Mr. BYRNS. That is all they have used. They only expended $1,350, for instance, in the year 1931. It has been found from past experience that they never use more than $1,500, and seldom that much. For that reason it has been fixed at that amount.

Mr. GOSS. But I was wondering if it would not encourage more to try to make inventions if they had a little more available, in view of the fact that we think it is important enough to legislate on it at all.

Mr. BYRNS. No; because if it were to happen at any time that the expenditures would amount to more than $1,500, they could come to Congress and get an additional appropriation.

Mr. GOSS. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to postmasters and for allowances for rent, light, fuel, and equipment to postmasters of the fourth class, $50,800,000.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: On page 53, line 6, after the figures, add the following proviso: "Provided, That none of this appropriation shall be available for payment of compensation to Charles J. Moos, postmaster at St. Paul, Minn."

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I have resorted to a drastic measure in order to force attention to a situation which I believe as a legislative body we have the right and obligation to inquire into.

The postmaster of St. Paul, Minn., Charles J. Moos—not to be confused with Maas—has been holding office for over two years without appointment, his previous term having expired. The department has consistently refused to submit his name to the Senate for confirmation or to call for an examination, as I have requested, for the appointment of a successor.

I have opposed the renomination of this postmaster because of his connection with the noncancelable lease of the commercial station at St. Paul, and that matter became a national scandal, of which this House took cognizance by legislative action in breaking that lease.

I have made charges against this postmaster but have had no opportunity to be officially heard on these charges. The Post Office Department has simply whitewashed him. The Postmaster General has taken a very high-handed attitude in the whole controversy.

I very much dislike to take the time of the committee, but I believe there is a matter of principle involved. If an administrative officer is to be permitted to hold appointees in office indefinitely in violation of the spirit of the Constitution and the statutes themselves then it is the duty of the legislative branch to correct the situation which permits that abuse. The statutes provide that the term of a postmaster is four years. They do not provide one day more than four years. The Constitution requires that the appointments of postmasters be submitted to the United States Senate for investigation and confirmation.

I charge that the Post Office Department is in a deliberate conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by keeping this man in office at a compensation of $8,000 a year without appointment; that they are protecting him and keeping him in a position whereby he does not have to defend himself against the charges which have been made and that they are conspiring to defeat the Constitution by preventing the Senate from exercising its prerogative of reviewing these appointments.

This man has now held office for more than two years since the expiration of his term. There is no way we can bring this matter to a head without the drastic action I have proposed, which is to abolish his salary. That would automatically force the administration to consider the proposition of sending his name to the Senate, where these charges can be officially investigated. I submit, gentlemen, that if the charges are unfair, or if they are trivial, as the Postmaster General claims, an opportunity should be given to investigate the charges and determine that as a fact. If this man is entitled to vindication and if he has such a valuable record, then certainly the people of St. Paul should know that, and this man is entitled to that vindication. The only place in which such vindication can be secured is in the United States Senate, where his nomination would go for confirmation. However, the administration knows this man would fail of confirmation because of the charges which have been made against him, and they are deliberately holding up his nomination because they fear both the result of such an investigation and the result of failure to confirm him, because then some more of the sordid story of this post-office scandal would come out. So this man is being kept in office by the Postmaster General, the same Postmaster General, Walter Brown, who has exonerated Mr. Moos of all these charges.

I charge that Postmaster General Brown is guilty of the grossest misconduct in office in shielding this man Moos against an investigation and in defeating the intent of the Constitution by denying to the United States Senate its right to pass upon the fitness of Moos for reappointment as postmaster at St. Paul. This same Postmaster General in an offensive and insulting manner refused to make available official records of his department to a Senate committee duly constituted to investigate these very matters of the Post Office Department.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Have there been any specific charges in writing filed in this case, hearings held, and evidence adduced in support of the charges?

Mr. MAAS. There were; yes, sir. The charges were made to me. I inherited this situation. The reappointment of this same postmaster was held up six years ago; that was before I became a Member of the Congress.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman misunderstands my question.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman means were any charges filed with the Post Office Department?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. Yes. I submitted those charges, with substantiating documents, to the Post Office Department.

Mr. GARBER. Was there any action taken?

Mr. MAAS. I was informed by Brown that the postmaster at St. Paul had been whitewashed, and they refused to give me a hearing or to permit me to see the alleged investigation. I challenged them to make it public, and still do.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is asking this committee to take action which will result in withholding the salary of this postmaster. On what evidence? What substantial evidence is the gentleman offering in support of such drastic action?

Mr. MAAS. If the committee will give me the time—and I know I can not crave too much indulgence—I will very briefly detail the specific charges.

Mr. GARBER. I certainly would join in a request that the gentleman be given sufficient time to inform the committee.

Mr. MAAS. That is exactly what I desire to do.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is the gentleman proposing to withhold the salary of the acting postmaster or that of the postmaster?

Mr. MAAS. He is not postmaster, yet he is drawing $8,000 a year. He is merely handling the office as acting postmaster without any kind of appointment since his term expired.

Mr. ARENTZ. By withholding the salary the gentleman is trying to make them nominate him as postmaster or put somebody in his place?

Mr. MAAS. Exactly; that is what I want to do. I want this thing adjudicated. I want this man's name either sent to the United States Senate, where I can be heard before an impartial body and present my charges with substantiating evidence, or if I am wrong I want my district and my people to know it, and I want this man vindicated, I want him reappointed and confirmed by the Senate. But if my charges are true, I want him removed from office, and I want a new postmaster appointed. [Applause.]

This man went into the insurance business after he was postmaster. He went into the insurance business, as all the evidence will indicate, for the specific purpose of getting the insurance on this noncancelable lease, and he got insurance on this building, which a Federal court later condemned, for $334,000 as the value of the building, the land, and the lease itself, and yet he carried insurance on this same building for these owners of over $1,000,000.

This was his part for his silence against the making of the rotten lease. He went to Chicago at Government expense to solicit this insurance at a time when he could have objected, as we know, to the lease being made noncancelable and his price not to protest was to be put into the insurance business and receive the insurance on this rotten building, which he did.

From this as a beginning he has made a very profitable insurance connection. He is vice president now of one of the largest insurance agencies in the country. He devotes less than two hours a day to his work as postmaster, for which he draws $8,000 a year, and the rest of the time he is either at his insurance office or he is out on the streets soliciting insurance in competition with men who are trying to make their living out of the insurance business. At a time like this, the people are justly indignant that men who have families dependent on them and who are solely dependent on their insurance business must compete with a high Government official drawing $8,000 a year who on Government time can go out and write insurance. Of course, he is in position to bring to bear a great deal of prestige and pressure in writing insurance. He carries the insurance on practically all the postal employees including their official bonds, and woe be it to an employee who does not boost the postmaster's private insurance business.

Understand, gentlemen, I am prepared to substantiate everything I am saying to you now. The men who are promoted in his organization are the men who are his stool pigeons and who go out and boost his insurance business.

He has a system whereby he has workers who are his stool pigeons sitting beside other workers and whenever they find that their fellow workers are going to buy automobiles or a home, they tell the postmaster and then the postmaster sends for these employees and tells them they had better give him their insurance.

I wish to emphasize that this is not a patronage fight, for I am not asking for patronage. I am demanding, however, that a postmaster be appointed at St. Paul, either this man or some one else. I am not concerned with who is postmaster but I am concerned with what kind of a man is postmaster and with how he uses that office.

I object to any public official using his public office to advance his own private interests for gain. That is what I charge Moos with doing. His chief and, it seems, sole concern in his office as postmaster is to use it to give him special advantages over his competitors in the insurance business. He has organized the postal employees into a huge and rather open sales force for his various private business enterprises. The gross impropriety of the postmaster's dealing with his Government employees in both a public and private capacity is too apparent to need discussion. How can he enforce official discipline against a postal employee who is a good insurance customer and a big business getter for Mr. Moos's firms? This relationship alone is enough to disqualify him for reappointment.

Ladies and gentlemen of the committee, from the beginning I took this matter first to the President and Postmaster General. I have been to them repeatedly and pleaded for them to straighten up this mess themselves. It was only after I could get no satisfaction that I brought the matter here to the House, which is the same course as had to be followed in the case of the infamous and scandalous lease at St. Paul, which was also defended, as this Postmaster Moos is, by this same Postmaster General Brown. I begged the President and officials of the Post Office Department to clean up this lease situation. It was only after persistent refusal to take action, and after Brown's defense of the lease, that I was forced to call the matter to the attention of Congress. Now the same thing has been repeated in the case of this postmaster at St. Paul, who was in office throughout that sordid transaction.

Gentlemen, under the circumstances where else could I take this situation? What else was left to do?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we have just seen the beautiful example of a gentleman trying to vent his personal spleen and have this deliberative body determine the matter for him.

If one-third of the things are true that this man has alleged, he has been derelict in his duty, or he would have brought to the attention of either the Appropriations Committee or the Post Office Committee, the charges that he is making here to-day.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not yield. I did not bother you.

I want to say that it is not only unfair, but it is unbecoming a man who styles himself a Congressman of the United States.

If what the gentleman says is true, and he says he is able to substantiate what he alleges, why did he not come before the Appropriations Committee and submit his facts? He did not come nor did he desire to come. He made no effort to come before the committee.

I can not believe that the Postmaster General of the United States is guilty of conspiracy to violate the law. If he has been or has violated the law, it is the duty of that gentleman to introduce a resolution to impeach him.

It is too easy for gentlemen, with utter disregard of the truth, with utter disregard of the situation, with utter disregard of the effect their blackened speeches may have, to get up on this floor and attack the character of men who have no chance to be heard. I say this is all wrong and ought to be condemned by all right-thinking men.

I know nothing about this case. I would like to know the facts about it, and if this man had done his duty and had gone before the committee, he would have submitted his facts.

Mr. MAJOR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MAJOR. Why has the department held this appointment over for two years without doing anything about it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know a thing about it. I suspect the Postmaster General would have been able to explain that. That is why I say this is an unfair proposition.

Mr. MAJOR. I will say to the gentleman that he was before a committee recently and did a mighty poor job of explaining it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know anything about that. If he did a poor job, why did you not send for the facts some place else?

It is not an unusual thing for a postmaster to hold over. I suspect there are a thousand in the United States that have held over for one or two or three or four years. This is not an unusual thing, and there must be some excuse for it or else it would not have obtained in this instance.

So I say to you, gentlemen, that if we are to be led away from the line of duty laid down for us by the oath of office we take here we will condemn this character of procedure and condemn the men who are guilty of violating, not only their oath of office but the duty that they owe to this Congress and to the public.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the use of worrying about it? After the 4th day of next March we Democrats are going to take control, and our appointment of postmasters will be prompt and decisive.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that is a nice way to settle it. I do not expect that this gentleman or any other Republican postmaster will be in office 15 minutes after that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Not if we can help it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a statement?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MAAS. I want to say that I did appear before the Appropriations Committee, and when the gentleman was chairman of it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We never had that question before us in the world.

Mr. MAAS. I asked for a hearing.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. When?

Mr. MAAS. I asked the gentleman from Indiana when he was chairman, and I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if I did not ask him for a hearing?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from Minnesota did approach me and say that he wanted to be heard, and that it was on this subject. I suggested to him that possibly we did not have jurisdiction.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman never asked me the question. The question he asked me was with reference to putting a prohibition upon the appropriation because of the row they had about the lease for this post office.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I know nothing of the controversy existing in Minnesota and could not possibly have any personal interest in it. I am not questioning what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] has said. Something ought to be done toward settling the proposition and making a permanent appointment, but that is not a matter that concerns me. That is a matter for the administration. I do not think this is the way to legislate on a matter of that sort. I do not think it is proper to come in and undertake to deny a salary on an appropriation bill. If we set that sort of a precedent, Members can clearly see where it would end. Every time there was an objection to some one, whether well founded or not, there would be a proposition to eliminate his salary. It seems to me there is a better way to get at that than in this way. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, including auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter post offices, printers, mechanics, skilled laborers, watchmen, messengers, laborers, and substitutes, $182,325,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I note that the amount provided in this section is $182,325,000. The amount provided in this section last year was $190,000,000. There is a reduction of almost $8,000,000. Is that reduction based on the provision at the end of the bill prohibiting the automatic increases in the Postal Service as provided by law, and in the event that that provision of the bill should be stricken from the bill either here or in another body, or eventually cast out of the bill, will $182,325,000 be sufficient to carry on the work in accordance with existing law?

Mr. BYRNS. We took $675,000 from the Budget estimate, and that amount represents the automatic increases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But there is a difference of almost $8,000,000 in the amount this year and the amount last year.

Mr. BYRNS. That is brought about by the difference in the volume of business now as compared with what it was when the original estimates were made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And $675,000 only is attributable to the contemplated savings in stopping the automatic increases?

Mr. BYRNS. The Budget estimate was $183,000,000, a considerable decrease from the present appropriation, due entirely to the fact that business had decreased about 7 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So that the only saving is $675,000 in connection with the intention of the committee to stop the automatic increases in salaries provided by law.

Mr. BYRNS. So far as this particular item is concerned; yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, it is hardly worth while, and I shall move to strike from the bill the provision limiting automatic increase, which after all is part of the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, $1,900,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The paragraph under consideration has engaged the attention of the committee in prior years. It is an appropriation, as I recall, that provides for an allowance to so-called drug store stations. The appropriation last year was $2,100,000. The Budget estimate was $1,950,000, and the committee has cut the Budget estimate $50,000. I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the Post Office Department to curtail the number of these contract stations at drug stores throughout the country, which are very serviceable to the public, or whether it is their policy to cut down the allowances.

Mr. BYRNS. No. It appeared that the expenditures this year would amount to $1,900,000. We have recommended the same amount for 1933.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the committee has made no allowance whatsoever for additional service.

Mr. BYRNS. No. Unless this additional service should come by a reduction of the cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Post Office Department has a sliding scale, whereby compensation is awarded according to the amount of business that the various contract stations do during the year, and it has been the policy as business increased to make increased allowances. The fact that last year only $1,900,000 was expended for this service shows there will not be any leeway whatsoever to provide for increased pay, where the business has increased above that being received according to the scale established by the Post Office Department.

Mr. BYRNS. In 1931 the expenditures were $1,870,000. The estimated expenditure this year is $1,900,000. As the gentleman knows, business is decreasing. They are not having anything like the business they had in prosperous times. In addition to that, there is considerable competition growing up with reference to the contract stations. Drug stores are very anxious to get them, and there are quite a number of contracts expiring.

Mr. STAFFORD. I must take issue with the gentleman's position that there is great competition for these stations. In my own city there are many drug stores that will not perfom the service for the scale of pay which the Government metes out because the service that the drug stores gives is three or four fold what they receive from the Government. I think the gentleman is in error when he says there is much competition for this service.

Mr. BYRNS. I will read what Mr. Coleman, the First Assistant Postmaster General, said:

We have anticipated a reduction this year on account of the conditions, and we anticipate there will be some spirited competition for these stations. During more prosperous times we have had considerable difficulty in getting first-class stores to put in contract stations, and where there was no competition in some cases it forced us to put in a classified station.

So, I repeat, the Post Office Department insists there will be a great deal more competition by drug stores and places of business seeking to secure these leases which are to be made the next year than heretofore.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rather agree with the gentleman's position that in these depressed times particularly the small drug-store proprietors are willing to take anything at all rather than lose the little gratuity or honorarium that they receive from the Post Office Department for this service, which really saves the Government millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. BYRNS. Now, may I call the attention of the gentleman to this further statement by Mr. Coleman? He was asked by me:

Then you are, in fact, not going to put in additional stations next year?

And he replied:

We may be able to put some in through savings in the competition that we anticipate. Stores are not as busy as they were two or three years ago, and we anticipate they will be more anxious to retain these stations, and possibly will lower their bids.

That is the theory upon which this appropriation was fixed.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For unusual conditions at post offices, $75,000.

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, last Friday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] presented a very thorough analysis of the operation of the Post Office Department. I was very much interested in his explanation showing that out of a total operating deficit for 1931 of the sum of $146,545,199 that the sum of $48,047,308 was not properly postal deficit at all but rather a contribution or subsidy made through the Post Office Department for the carrying on of various governmental functions which are deemed expedient and wise.

There is, however, another item which he did not discuss which, in my opinion, could well have been included under the general classification of postal subsidies. It is the sum of $50,800,000 paid to postmasters. In the main this item is nothing more or less than a political subsidy paid to the dominant national political party.

Last Thursday an editorial appeared in the Baltimore Evening Sun entitled "Suggestion to Uncle Sam":

The politicians of this region are already fighting over the postmastership made vacant by the death of Benjamin F. Woelper, jr. The postmastership in a city the size of Baltimore is a fat job, and from time immemorial it has been used to pay political debts.

But what need has Baltimore for a postmaster? It isn't he who does the real work. The post office is run by a permanent staff under the direction of a permanent assistant. The political postmaster could be a pure dumb-bell and the work would go on just the same. He could live in California and the work would still go on. In fact, in most cases it would probably go on better were he not around to gum up the work by injecting his political ideas.

Uncle Sam is hard up. He needs money badly. Why doesn't he save a little by letting Baltimore go without a political postmaster until times get better and we can afford such luxuries?

Now, I can well realize that this is not a matter that we could expect the regular Republicans to go into because they are the dispensers of political patronage aggregating approximately $50,000,000 a year, which is truly a party's ransom. Nor, on the other hand, could we very well expect the Democrats to make an issue of this matter, particularly in view of the fact that they think they can see within their reach this vast ocean of gravy. But in so far as we progressives from Wisconsin are concerned, it does not make any difference. If we had a Democratic administration we would have nothing to say about the appointment of postmasters, nor do we have anything to say about these matters of political patronage under a Republican administration, although I presume we could have our share of this patronage if we were willing to become administration "yes" men. We are in the position of an illiterate State legislator who declared that he would not sell his birthright for a "mess of partridges."

I have considered the introduction of an amendment to this bill, either striking out or greatly reducing the amount of money made available for the payment of postmasters' salaries, but will not do so, for I realize that this would be neither just nor equitable to a large number of politically appointed postmasters who are doing their work faithfully and efficiently. If we were to reduce the appropriation available for the payment of postmasters' salaries, it would merely mean that these men would be the first ones who would be displaced, while the postmasters more useful politically would be retained.

The situation, in my opinion, can only be cured by having the office of postmaster placed on a civil-service basis, with promotions for this office coming from the ranks of the postal employees.

It is my understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYDE KELLY, has introduced in this House from time to time measures that would accomplish this result, but that he has never been able to get any of these bills reported out of committee. I very sincerely hope that the majority party will avail itself of its opportunity and pass this much-needed legislation. It is long overdue.

I am sure that it would have been enacted before now but for the reforms inaugurated by President Harding, which apparently sought to accomplish this result.

HARDING'S HOPE

On the 10th day of May, 1921, the late President Harding issued an Executive order, providing as follows:

When a vacancy exists or occurs in the position of postmaster of an office of the first, second, or third class, if such vacancy is not filled by nomination of some qualified person within the competitive classified civil service, the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers submitted therewith have been rated the commission shall furnish a certificate of not less than three eligibles, if the same can be obtained, to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of one of the highest three eligibles for appointment to fill such vacancy.

This Executive order expressed the pious hope that the administration supporters would permit the vacant postmasterships to be filled by civil service out of the ranks of the postal employees, but further provided that if the situation should arise where the vacancy was not filled in this manner, then the Postmaster General was to recommend for appointment to the President one of the three men who stood highest in a civil-service examination. In practice, however, we have seen that the appointment of a postmaster out of the classified civil service has been a rare exception rather than the rule. The administration has been given little rest by its supporters. Examinations are usually given until the chosen man becomes one of the three eligibles, whereupon he is appointed. The whole proceeding is but a farce. But despite the modus operandi by which these postmasters got their jobs, the effect of this Executive order has been bad upon these postmasters from a standpoint of party usefulness.

The mere fact that they, in form, had written a civil-service examination made them feel that they were civil-service employees, and they sought retirement from politics within the cloistered atmosphere of their respective post offices. The Executive order apparently deceived no one but the postmasters themselves. It led them to believe that they were Government employees rather than subsidized politicians. From an administration standpoint it became necessary to make them realize that while they are classed as second-line zouaves they must still come to the front as shock troops every four years, and oftener if occasion demands it.

In a speech delivered at Omaha, Nebr., September 17, 1931, Postmaster General Brown said:

As the period approaches, which comes every four years, when public attention is focused for a time upon national politics, spokesmen for themselves and for various groups, partisan and otherwise, are prone to be generous with their observations with respect to the duties, obligations, and limitations in matters political.

The indisputable fact is that the laws of our land place no restrictions whatever upon presidential officers, a term which includes postmasters of the first, second, and third classes. The statutes which forbid political activity on the part of Government employees are limited in their application to members of the classified service. They have no relation whatever to executive officials who are appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"Beyond all question the best politics is the best public service," he said.

About the same time First Assistant Postmaster General Arch Coleman, at a postmasters' convention in Ashland, Ky., defended the right of the postmasters to mix in politics. He said:

I have never had much use for a mugwump or a man without political convictions. * * * Presidential postmasters have every right to show their loyalty to the administration, of which they are a part, by presenting to their friends and neighbors the truth relative to the activities of the administration.

Even this brusque reminder did not serve sufficiently to get the postmasters out of their cloistered retreats and into the first-line trenches. Subsequently, on January 18, 1932, at Appleton, Wis., W. Irving Glover, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, urged the 350 Wisconsin postmasters there assembled to roll up their sleeves and prove their allegiance to the Republican Party who got them their jobs, by campaigning for Hoover. The message, according to a newspaper version, was one, first, of optimism of the "prosperity around the corner type" wherein comment was made on the weakness of the Democratic forces, and the closing part was an administration version of Lord Nelson's appeal to his men, "England expects every man to do his duty." The newspaper report of the meeting is as follows:

Glover said that in his opinion there was no outstanding candidate for the Presidency on whom the Democrats would agree that could win against President Hoover. He declared that postmasters owe allegiance to the party because it got them their jobs. He said that it was time they banded together and shouted their party loyalty from the housetops.

First, second, and third class postmasters are not under civil service and are under no restrictions to keep out of politics, said Mr. Glover. He said they owe their jobs to the Republican Party, now headed by Mr. Hoover, and they should prove their loyalty by working for him. Their only duty as postmasters is to work their full eight hours and see that the Postal Service is up to standard, he said, and then they can get up enthusiasm for their party the rest of the time.

The people of the country, however, are awaiting with interest any remarks that may be made by the Third or Fourth Assistant Postmaster Generals of the United States to the postmasters in conclave assembled. They will probabaly be in the nature of the exhortation of a football coach to the members of his losing team between halves.

Commenting on these talks, the Milwaukee Journal, conservative Democratic paper, on January 18, 1932, said:

Mr. Glover gives himself away in his counsel, "Most people are under the impression that a postmaster can't enter politics." True, most people are. And where did they get that impression? From the long fight that has been waged to take the post office out of politics and conduct it for what it really is, a business institution. That has been the battle for civil service, and gains have been made. Yet listen to this from Mr. Glover:

"Postmasters should get out and work for their party and be glad to do it. The postmaster should be a leader and booster of his party in his district."

The case of President Hoover must be pretty bad. And he probably does need all the help he can get. But is he, and are his "yes" men, considering what the consequences are to be? At one leap they go back, frankly and brazenly, to the spoils system. Is what Andrew Jackson fastened on the Nation for many decades to be the Hoover way in an extremity?

In the South the spoils system, and worse, has never been routed. The virtual sale of post offices has been a national scandal. The North has claimed to be against such a thing. If the postmaster, however, must be first of all a party man, judged as a ward heeler rather than as a business executive who handles the mails efficiently, how long will it be until post offices will be sold to the highest party bidder in northern cities?

UNFAIR TO POSTAL EMPLOYEES

It is a gross injustice to the men who devote their life work to this important service of our Government that they must always work under a superior who holds his position solely because of political influence and because of political service that he may be able to render. I do not believe that we can find in the United States to-day any group of men in any kind of work employed at a comparable wage who render the efficient service given by the postal employees.

Certainly the average postmaster is no abler than is the average of the civil-service employees who work under him. Besides this, of course, he does not have their experience with the duties of the post office gained through many years of work and apprenticeship. I do not care whether it is in the post office or any industry, there is no man so well qualified to run and operate it as a man who has worked his way up from the bottom, because he is familiar with every detail through long work and experience.

It would be only fair that the postmastership of each post office should be filled by a postal employee who has worked his way up. It would give to each civil-service employee in the Postal Service a goal toward which he could strive. Certainly, if he understands the working of the post office and is honest and efficient, he should be better qualified to fill such office than is a man who has played politics most of his life.

UNFAIR TO THE POSTAL SERVICE

In fairness to the Post Office Department and the work which it performs the Postal Service should have the opportunity to make use of men who have learned the work from the bottom up. It is elemental that the most successful heads of industry generally are men who have served their apprenticeship by working their way up from the bottom. The trouble now is that the whole post-office system has to be organized on such a basis that the real work of the department will go on no matter what the qualifications of the politically appointed postmaster may be, whether there is a vacancy in the office, and, if filled, whether such postmaster so appointed functions or not. It would be only fair that the Post Office Department should be relieved from the necessity of providing this tremendous political subsidy every year to the dominant political party.

IMPROVED FEDERAL SERVICE

There has never been a time when it was so essential that the functions of government be maintained on an honest, efficient, and nonpartisan basis. This can not be done if we are to permit politics to enter into the public service. The time is now at hand when the functions that must be performed by the Government will become increasingly greater rather than less. I realize that there will be a great outcry against this on the part of those who would leave the individual wholly at the mercy of the great monopolies and concentrated wealth which is in control of the economic life of the country and of the economic well-being of every individual as well. Nevertheless, this same group, when they felt themselves in danger, did not hesitate to come to Congress and ask that a $2,000,000,000 corporation be set up to aid them out of their difficulties, on the threat that if this were not done the whole credit and banking structure of the country would collapse. Many thoughtful men realize that the theory of laissez faire is fast becoming inoperative. This is apparently realized by the increasing number of groups which call upon Congress for legislative help at every session. If this is true, I submit that it is doubly important that the Government service be maintained on an honest, efficient, and nonpolitical basis. It is an opportunity that I hope the majority party will not pass by. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment and in opposition to the position taken by my distinguished colleague, who is new to legislative procedure in this House.

I can not agree with my colleague from the first district of Wisconsin that the postmasters filling the offices of the first class are merely supernumeraries. Certainly the postmaster at New York, the postmaster at Chicago, the postmaster at my home city, and, in fact, the postmasters in all the leading cities of the country fulfill a very required service in directing the affairs of their respective offices. The work would not go on without the executive ability of those men. During Democratic administrations and during Republican administrations I have known of men in charge of the administrative work of the big post offices of this country who gave very high service in directing the administration of their respective offices.

The gentleman from the first district of Wisconsin has many first-class post offices and many second and third class post offices in his district. I am acquainted with one, because a part of that district 20 or more years ago was a part of the district I now have the honor to represent, that of Waukesha. There a former postal clerk was raised to the position of postmaster. He was appointed during the last six years by reason of his ability, and I do not think he was appointed by reason of any political affiliations.

Let me say for the benefit of the Members that when I first entered Congress, 29 years ago, all postmasters were appointed as a result of politics. The fourth-class postmasters throughout the country were named at the suggestion of political referees in Democratic States, if the Republican Party was in power, and in Republican States the Congressmen from the various districts were charged with the responsibility of determining the appointees themselves.

However, under President Harding the civil-service rule was extended to the first, second, and third class offices.

I suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin classifies me as an administration man, but let me say to him that in all of my service in this House, dating back 29 years and over a period of 20 years, I never had the recommendation of a postmaster in Milwaukee.

As I understand it, if there is a vacancy, there is an examination held, and I know the present postmaster at Milwaukee, against my protest nine years ago, was recommended for appointment because he was in the first three of those recommended by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MURPHY rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MURPHY. I just want to inquire at this point whether in the days when the postmaster was appointed because of his political faith, we did not have pretty good postmasters?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am one of the few that believe in a principle that I am not afraid to enunciate on the floor of this House so far as postmasters are concerned, and it is a principle I have held for many, many years. For one, so far as the first-class offices are concerned, I would not continue to allow them to hold office for more than two terms. I believe it is advantageous to the service to put in new blood, to put in business men after a certain period of incumbency of four or eight years; otherwise they become nothing more than creatures of red tape. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I remember years back, because during the first eight years of my service in this House from 1903 to 1911 it was my privilege to serve on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. And during those years the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had the preparation of the appropriation bill. It was my privilege from the very beginning of my service to serve on the subcommittee having charge of the Post Office appropriation bill. I gave intensive study to post-office affairs, and during all these years I have believed that what is essential is to have business men occupy these high positions of responsibility and to have periodic changes, so that new ideas may be introduced.

My attention in those early years was called to a Vermonter who had been in the Post Office Department for 20 years or 25 years, and he said that the trouble with the Post Office Department and the Postal Service was that it was just honeycombed with red tape.

Oh, I could go on and go on to show that the Postal Service has suffered by reason of not being up to date in business ideas, and for one I favor the turning out every eight years of the postmasters, regardless of their records, and putting in good, efficient men who will bring new ideas from the business world, especially in these very important positions. This idea of continuing men in these responsible positions for all time because they were once qualified under the civil service is not according to my idea of business efficiency and business progress.

Mr. MEAD and Mr. KELLER rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield first to the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MEAD. Does the gentleman think it is advantageous for the service to have the Postmaster General issue an order that virtually drives the postmaster into politics, and at the same time issue a second order which is posted on the bulletin board of every post office, making it an offense for the rank and file to participate in politics?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not acquainted with those respective orders, but I would not circumscribe the postal employees, and I do not believe there is any order that circumscribes the right of any civil-service employee to do as he sees fit in the exercise of his high functions of citizenship. [Applause.]

I know a vice president of a civil-service organization in my home city that libeled and lied about me——

Mr. MEAD. He should be severely punished.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, severely punished. I have had rural carriers, I have had letter carriers, I have had post-office clerks' organizations all against me, but I have never sought and will never seek to have them deprived of their bread and butter because of their opposition to me because of any political position they may have taken. I will be able to maintain my position in this House by reason of my record here.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. I just wanted to know whether the gentleman knew of another case where a man won out purely because of his merit and without any political merit to either a first-class or second-class or third-class office in Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; I could name the postmaster at Hartland, a second-class office; and if I were on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads giving the same detailed attention to the matter I did during the first eight years of my service here, I could name innumerable cases.

I believe that to-day in all the second, third, and first class offices, the Postal Service has reached a far better stage of efficiency than ever before in the history of the Government; and while I do not like any occasion where I am called upon to reply or take a position against the new Member from the first Wisconsin district, yet I felt called upon, in justice to the service and to the way in which it is administered, to rise here and give some little information which I have at first hand. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of rural carriers, auxiliary carriers, substitutes for rural carriers on annual and sick leave, clerks in charge of rural stations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, and for the incidental expenses thereof, $106,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I regard the item making appropriations for the Rural Delivery Service, of $106,000,000, as one of the most important in this or any other bill that comes up for consideration of Congress.

Approximately one-fourth of the people of the United States live upon the farms. This appropriation is designed to give to the people living in the rural communities the same mail service as those people enjoy who live in the cities and towns. When I entered Congress the amount appropriated for the rural mail service was $53,000,000. The amount carried in this bill is exactly twice as much.

The rural mail service has expanded rapidly during the past few years. It was established in 1896 when William L. Wilson was Postmaster General in the second Cleveland administration. Three experimental routes were then established.

The report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, indicates there were 42,412 rural mail routes in operation on that date and that the total mileage of these routes aggregated 1,354,759 miles. The average length of a rural route is 31.943 miles.

During the past 10 years there has been a net decrease of 1,340 routes brought about through consolidations, and during the past year there has been a decrease of 939 routes, with 73 established, or a net reduction of 866 routes.

There is a demand for additional rural mail service, either through new routes or extension of existing ones. The report shows that at the end of the fiscal year there were in the hands of inspectors for investigation and report 143 cases.

The amount appropriated for this service for the current year was $107,550,000. This bill, for the next fiscal year, carries $106,000,000, or $1,550,000 less than the appropriation for the current year. The bill carries for this particular item the full amount of the Budget estimate.

I want to express my regret that the Budget did not estimate as much for the coming year as for the current year. The report of the Postmaster General shows that the number of petitions received for the establishment of new routes during the past year was 633 and that of these 454 were accepted for investigation by inspectors, and that improved facilities were extended to rural communities without the need for increase appropriations for the past two years.

I wanted to bring to your attention the following closing sentence in this part of the report of the Postmaster General (p. 16):

On the contrary the amounts appropriated by Congress have not been fully expended for the past several years.

I have had a number of requests for additional mail facilities from my district. I now recall two—one for the extension of a rural route out of Stilwell in Adair County, Okla., and the other for the extension of a rural route out of Keota, Haskell County, Okla. Both would have given increased mail facilities to the people who live in those respective communities. The extensions were not granted, as stated by the Postmaster General, because:

We are therefore not in position to take favorable action upon any cases that would increase the cost of the rural mail service.

I live in one of the new States of the Union. We are developing rapidly. Roads are being extended throughout every community and bridges are being built across the streams. The older States have the advantage in that good systems of roads were built earlier, and as a consequence rural routes were established at a much earlier date, so that the rural communities in the older States are fairly adequately served. The decision not to expend money in the new States, and particularly throughout the West, is a discrimination against those States.

I do not think there is any appropriation which meets with more enthusiastic approval than the item under consideration making appropriation for the rural mail service and the appropriation for the Federal contribution toward the building of good roads, both of which are so greatly appreciated by and assist the people who live in the rural communities.

I have read the hearings before the subcommittee, which would indicate that Mr. George L. Wood, in charge of the rural mail service, believes that the amount contained in the bill, and estimated for by the Budget, is adequate, and that through consolidations new routes may be established and old ones extended.

There is no service which is more helpful to the rural population. This service permits the farmers to take daily papers, keep up with current events, keep advised of market conditions, and saves them much time for their work on the farms.

The amount paid a rural carrier is $1,800 per annum for a standard route of 24 miles, with 4 cents per mile additional for equipment. They receive $30 per mile for each additional mile over the standard route.

On June 30, 1931, there were 47,833 post offices of all classes in the United States. Through these offices the people are served by postmasters, assistants, clerical help, city and village carriers, and star-route and rural mail carriers. In the aggregate they constitute a veritable army of the employees of the Government and are very important to the people of the country. Nearly all of them are under the civil service. They are well-trained, active, loyal, intelligent, efficient public servants.

It has been my good fortune to be able to attend many of their district meetings. They are to be commended and complimented upon their efforts to improve the service, which is both efficient and courteous. Throughout the year, in season and out of season, each is at his post with clock-like precision. Whether in the office or on the trains, along the rural routes or in the air, these employees serve the people of the country with fidelity.

The air service is a new one and is being rapidly expanded. The amount carried in the bill for this service is $19,000,000, which is a reduction of $1,000,000, but it is insisted that no injury will come to the service for the reason that there are indications that favorable contracts covering the entire mileage may be made by the Government within the amount of the appropriation. The amount carried for air service in the pending bill is more than was expended for this service for the year ended June 30, 1931. This appropriation is not only for carrying the mail but to stimulate aircraft. We can now vision the time in the near future when aircrafts of much larger capacity will in a large measure replace railway and automobile travel.

In addition, the aircraft should be stimulated for national defense. Through the amounts appropriated for the Army and the Navy and the Post Office Department and the amounts expended in commercial flying there has been a wonderful development in aircraft in the last decade.

I really arose not to make a speech but to call attention to the importance of the Postal Service and to pay a tribute to the postal employees.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 14, strike out the sum "$106,000,000" and insert "$106,850,000."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of my amendment. On last Friday I undertook to discuss this subject matter that has been discussed by our colleague, Mr. HASTINGS, and to indicate reasons which to my mind were sufficient for the restoration of at least a part of the reduction made by the Appropriations Committee in this item of the bill.

I am in accord, of course, with the efforts of the Appropriations Committee to effect economies in the several departments, and I am sure that every Member of this House and the country as a whole appreciate sincerely the fact that they have been able to accomplish economies along this line.

And yet no economy is desirable which would have the effect of crippling the Rural Free Delivery Mail Service, depriving farmers of this country of any portion of any benefits that they now receive from this governmental activity. The appropriation for the last two years has been $1,550,000 in excess of the appropriation carried in this bill. Those of you who have read the evidence which was taken before the Appropriations Committee, set out on pages 87 to 92 et seq., of the hearings, copies of which I hope you have before you, will notice that it is proposed to effect this economy in only three ways: First, by the consolidation of existing rural routes; second, by the entire declination of any additional routes; and, third, by declining all applications for extensions of existing routes. It is not clearly apparent to one who scans this record of evidence before this committee carefully just how these economies, if they should amount to as much as is estimated by the Bureau of the Budget, would effect a saving of $1,550,000, because it is estimated that the saving on account of consolidation of rural routes next year will amount to only $300,000, that the elimination of the addition of new routes will effect a saving of $44,000, and that the elimination of extensions of existing routes will save $150,000, making, I believe, a total of $494,000.

But let us consider whether it is desirable that we should cripple the service by consolidations, which in many instances are unwise and could only be justified by the most extreme need for economy, and by the refusing in all instances to permit the establishment of a new route or the extension of an existing route. I think gentlemen will agree with me, those of you who represent, as I do, rural constituencies, that many consolidations have been effected by the department which have seriously hampered the rural service. I call attention to the fact that the superintendent or chief of the Bureau of Rural Mails, testifying before the Appropriations Committee, said that consolidations in the matter of one route in California had increased the length of the route to 90 miles and the salary of the carrier, together with allowances for his equipment, to almost $5,000 per year, destroying opportunities for other men to secure employment, paying in this instance, and doubtless in many more to which attention is not called, substantially double the average salary of the rural carrier. The department's policy of consolidation, as I know, speaking now with relation to cases in my own district, sometimes effects consolidations of routes which can not be successfully carried throughout the year in all kinds of weather by one man. The Post Office Department has its maps, which, of course, look smooth no matter if the routes run through mountainous country or across creeks and rivers, and examining them it says it can take this 35-mile route here and that 45-mile route there and consolidate them and let one man carry by automobile 80 miles a day, when, as a matter of fact, he may be able to do it nine months in the year, but during bad weather in the winter and spring it would be impossible; and where such consolidations are accomplished that fact is demonstrated with injustice to the carrier and injury to the service.

So much for the question of consolidations. It appears in these hearings with relation to the creation of new routes, that there are now approved by the Post Office Department approximately 100 new routes which can not be established if this appropriation is cut, as is proposed. It is also shown by the hearings that there have been approved many hundreds of extensions to existing routes which can not be allowed if the appropriation is cut. I know something is said in the hearings about the possibility of allowing some extensions in emergency cases, but all of you know, who have dealt with matters of this kind, that for the last several months the Post Office Department has allowed no extensions, and that policy has come about when it had an appropriation of $1,550,000 in excess of the appropriation carried in this bill. If it could not allow extensions with that appropriation, how can you expect it to be done if the appropriation shall be decreased as proposed in this bill? I want to read from a letter just received by me from the First Assistant Postmaster General, a declaration of his present policy, with relation to one particular route in my district where an extension has been approved—and this is only one instance of a great many of similar character. He says:

This change, which will involve an increase in the cost of operating the service, has been approved. In view of the present conditions of the national finances, however, we are obliged to consider the probability of a lesser amount being available for the conduct of the rural mail service next year than is now provided. Until this matter is definitely determined it is impossible to create any obligations that would be an additional charge on the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

So if now, with an appropriation of $107,550,000, the same appropriation that was had during the fiscal year 1931, it is impossible for the department to grant any extension or to create any new routes, then how utterly impossible it would be for a year and a half, at least until the end of the fiscal year 1933, if we fail to add something to this appropriation, which this bill reduces to $106,000,000, to hope service of that character will be accorded our constituents who do not now receive it; and in that particular let me point out that in many of these cases where petitions for extensions have been approved the department has heretofore indicated to these patrons that if they would put their roads in condition, if they would comply with the regulations of the department, service would be accorded them.

It is not good faith to refuse extensions under such circumstances.

I know of one instance in my own district where a great deal of money has been spent by the people, in accordance with suggestions from the department, improving their roads so as to qualify for this service, and after having spent their money and having qualified, then the department informed them that on account of stringent economic conditions the service could not be accorded them.

We are not asking that all of the $1,550,000 which the Appropriations Committee has stricken from this appropriation be restored, but let us at least give this amount, less the amount they figure they can save by consolidations. In other words, they say they will save $400,000 by reason of consolidations effected this year, and that they will effect other consolidations next year which will save an additional $300,000.

[Here the gavel fell].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. I thank the Chairman and the Members for the courtesy of extending me this time. I do not as a rule consume much of your time. I am very deeply interested in this matter. It is not being urged as a matter of formality but as one of substantial justice to the rural population of this country.

I am offering an amendment which proposes to deduct the $400,000 which the department claims to be able to save by consolidations effected this year and the $300,000 which they claim they will be able to save next year by additional consolidations, or $700,000, from $1,550,000, the amount of the reduction in the appropriation, and to restore the difference, $850,000, to the appropriation, in order that this service may continue to function in the best interests of the rural population of the country and without injury and damage to the service which they are now receiving. I think this is a modest request. I do not believe that the needs for economy go to the extent of requiring the House to seriously injure or hamper a service which, under the law under which it was established, was to be extended as rapidly as possible to serve the entire rural population of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, in the 1924 appropriation bill for the Post Office Department, Mr. Madden, chairman of the Appropriations Committee at that time, recommended an increase of $1,350,000 over the previous year, to be used in lengthening rural routes already established and in establishing new routes where needed. In contrast to this the same appropriation bill carried an increase of $6,300,000, to be used in extending routes in towns and cities. When this section of the bill was reached the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that I was the first Member of this House to point out the discrimination that was being made against the extension of mail service to the country people. At that time I did not discredit the need of the extension of mail service in the cities and towns, but since about half of our people lived in the country and on the farms I did not think this division of funds was right, and I am happy to state to-day that my discussion of this question resulted in the bill being recommitted carrying an additional million dollars for the extension and creation of rural routes. At that time as well as now many needed extensions were being denied by the Post Office Department, but the increase which was secured has enabled me to secure in my district rural free delivery service to more than 5,000 people. Not only were the people of my district benefited by this increase but thousands of other rural people throughout the Nation were benefited. At this time I am fearful that the defeat of the amendment of Mr. TARVER, of Georgia, which seeks to continue the same appropriation of last year, will mean that we will not be able to secure any extensions or new rural routes for this year.

I favor the Tarver amendment even in spite of the fact that it is time for the Nation to economize. The defeat of this amendment will deny service to the very people who have been and are now receiving the least consideration from our Government. I stand foursquare for economy in all appropriation bills and I shall point out to you wherein we can economize in this bill and not injure the mail service. On page 57 of this bill, line 25, there is an appropriation of $19,000,000 to cover the cost of air mail service. When this item is reached I have an amendment prepared to strike out the $19,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $10,000,000, which if passed will mean a saving each year of $9,000,000. The testimony disclosed in the hearings on this item shows that a reliable air-transport company stated that it would carry the air mail for one-half the amount being paid for same under the existing contracts. You may not adopt my amendment, but the time is coming in this country when we will be forced to cut out these subsidies. I contend that it is unfair to pay a subsidy of $9,000,000 a year to air-transport companies for the benefit of the users of air mail service and deny needed mail service to the country people. On page 17 of the committee's report on this bill is shown a subsidy of $19,000,000 being paid annually to shipping concerns engaged in carrying foreign mail. This $19,000,000 is an annual net loss to our Government, because the postage collected on this foreign mail falls short this enormous amount.

Items like these in this bill and in other appropriation bills should be stricken out so that the Government can live within its income.

Within a few days the Ways and Means Committee will bring before this House a tax measure, and it is my understanding that it proposes to levy a sales tax on practically every necessity of life. This means that clothing, shoes, hardware, medicine, automobiles, automobile repairs, tires, household furnishings, and many other articles will be increased in price to the consumer. It is also indicated that electricity and gasoline will be taxed and admissions to picture shows will be included. All of these proposed taxes strike at the masses of our people who are already burdened with property taxes, and privilege taxes, levied by the municipalities, counties, and States, which taxes Congress is powerless to remove or reduce, but we can and should equalize the tax burden on all the people of this Nation by refusing to increase the tax burdens upon millions of people who have but little of this world's goods, and we should increase the income-tax rates upon those who have made and are continuing to make huge fortunes. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, regardless of what disposition may be made of the tax measure which will later come before this House, I hope the Tarver amendment to this bill will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the committee has not cut the Budget estimate one single cent. The Budget estimate was $106,000,000. This is one of the few items in the bill which the committee did not seek to reduce. I just wonder if this House, which has stood so loyally in behalf of economy during the consideration of all appropriation bills, and which has refused, in spite of every pressure, to increase any item of the Budget, is going to make an exception here. I do not think so, especially when I tell you that the superintendent of rural free delivery states that $106,000,000 will enable him to carry on next year as he is carrying on this year, and will enable him to maintain the present high standard of service.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Did not the Chief of the Bureau of Rural Mails, referred to by the gentleman indicate further that proceeding under the appropriation as provided in this bill would necessitate the disallowance of petitions for extensions of existing routes, the creation of new routes, and affect the making of more consolidations of existing routes?

Mr. BYRNS. The superintendent of rural mails stated that he expected to save, through consolidations, the sum of $300,000 next year. I repeat, and the hearings so show, that he said the amount estimated by the Budget would enable him to maintain the present service, and, through savings, to put in some extensions; and, as Mr. Coleman said, he hoped to be able to put in some new routes, although there was no definite promise to that effect.

The gentleman from Georgia stated that they had more than $107,000,000 for the current year, but I call attention to the fact that they propose to expend this year only $106,543,000. They will turn back into the Treasury on June 30 $1,127,000. Now, why should we undertake to increase this appropriation over and above what the Budget has estimated, simply for the purpose of having it turned back to the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that many rural routes are still in existence which were laid out in the horse and buggy and mud roads era, where other consolidations are possible, so as to still further take advantage of the new era of good roads and thus save considerable additional sums?

Mr. BYRNS. Precisely. And I want to say that the Post Office Department is doing a splendid work in this matter of consolidating rural routes. No rural carrier loses his job; no one is displaced, but when a vacancy occurs in the rural service and it is found possible to consolidate that route with one other or with two others, as the case may be, it is consolidated, and no carrier is appointed to fill the vacancy. In that way the Post Office Department this year will save $400,000 to this service and to the Government, and it will save next year not less than $300,000, and Mr. Wood, the chief of the Rural Delivery Service, said in these hearings that it might be possible to save $400,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman believe the Post Office Department ought to retain that much money out of these appropriations when there are new applications for routes which have been approved by the inspectors and when there are extensions of routes which have been approved by the inspectors? I want to say to the gentleman that the letters from which I have quoted show that the statement has been made that these extensions could not be made because of financial conditions, and yet I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Postmaster General in his report says they have had money left over every year. How does the gentleman reconcile these statements?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. I said a moment ago that there would be $1,127,000 turned back into the Treasury on June 30. The gentleman refers to financial conditions. I presume he is speaking of the condition of this particular appropriation?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is exactly what I am speaking of.

Mr. BYRNS. But if the gentleman was speaking of the financial condition of the country, I do not know when it was as bad as it is now and when this Congress could render a better service to the country than by refusing to make unnecessary appropriations, thus preventing an increase in the deficit which it is said will exist June 30, 1933. However, the gentleman himself is a supporter of the rule and stood for it in connection with the Interior Department appropriation bill to the effect that we would not increase any items beyond that recommended by the Budget, and I would be surprised if my warm, personal friend from Oklahoma, one of the most earnest supporters of economy in the House, should undertake to increase an item above that of the Budget estimate, because if we should adopt this amendment it would mean increasing that estimate by $850,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will yield, he is not going to get away with that. I did not criticize the gentleman because the committee allowed the full amount of the bureau's estimate, but the gentleman is not going to dodge me when I ask him this question: Does he believe that any of these appropriations should be left unexpended when there are applications for routes that have been approved and applications for extensions of routes that have been approved by the inspectors? That is what I want the gentleman to reply to.

Mr. BYRNS. I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought the gentleman was advocating this increase and I am very glad to know he is not.

Mr. HASTINGS. But I want the money we appropriate expended, and that is what I am inveighing against.

Mr. BYRNS. I agree with the gentleman, if that will satisfy the gentleman, that if they had routes which properly ought to have been put in, of course, they should have been put in.

Mr. HASTINGS. Every Congressman who represents a rural district knows that is true.

Mr. BYRNS. However, I will say to the gentleman that he is not going to cure that situation by appropriating $850,000 over and above the Budget Bureau's estimate.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am trying to put a little fire under the Post Office Department in order to make them expend the money appropriated by Congress and as directed by the Congress of the United States to be expended.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think that every Member who represents a rural district has received letters similar to those received by our colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], and it seems to me the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia should be agreed to, for this reason: That if they had gone ahead and put in the routes that were approved by the inspectors, there would have been no complaint; but the fact is that every Member of Congress who represents a rural district was advised that these routes were not put in because of the lack of funds, yet it appears from the gentleman's statement that quite a sum of money is to be turned back into the Treasury which could have been used in establishing new routes or extending old routes.

Mr. BYRNS. But how are we going to cure that situation by appropriating $850,000 more than the Budget estimates and that much more than the Post Office Department states it is going to spend in 1933, and when, as a matter of fact, they are actually turning back this year into the Treasury $1,127,000? There is no use permitting ourselves to be misled in connection with an item of this sort. I have always been in favor of rural routes, and I am to-day. I want to see them continued and increased as the years go by, but there is no use losing our heads because this is a matter that affects rural free delivery. As I have said, we have not increased the Budget in a single item in any of these appropriations, and I appeal to the committee to keep up its good record in this instance. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. It appears, however, that there are 2,000 or 3,000 routes that could be established, but they say they can not be established because they do not have the money, yet they are turning back quite a sum of money into the Treasury this year.

Mr. BYRNS. How is the gentleman going to cure the situation, when it appears that we appropriated $1,127,000 more than they are going to use during the present fiscal year?

Mr. PATTERSON. But that might occur in the future if we did not take the proper action.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TARVER and Mr. PATTERSON) there were—ayes 27, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise, including the cost of advertising in connection with the award of contracts authorized by the merchant marine act of 1928 (U. S. C., title 46, secs. 861–889; Supp. V, title 46, secs. 886–891x), $38,816,000: Provided, That not to exceed $7,000,000 of this sum may be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft under contracts which will not create obligations for the fiscal year 1934 in excess of $7,000,000: Provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $250,000 to cover the cost to the United States for maintaining sea post service on ocean steamships conveying the mails to and from the United States and not to exceed $3,600 for the salary of the assistant director, division of International Postal Service, with headquarters at New York City.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 57, line 14, after the word "City," insert: "Provided further, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid on contract No. 56 awarded to the Seatrain Co. under the provisions of the merchant marine act of 1928."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to beg the attention of the committee for what I consider to be one of the most flagrant, incredible abuses of the merchant marine act. The act was passed for the purpose of aiding American shipping to meet foreign competition.

Now, please, gentlemen, listen to this. It is incredible.

The Post Office Department advertised for bids to transport railroad cars from the United States to Cuba, and so drafted the specifications that only one company could bid. This is bad enough in itself, but this one company was a Canadian company, operating one ship built in England and flying the British flag.

These are the facts, gentlemen. After the bids were put in, an American company from New Orleans called the attention of the department to the fact that they were operating two American ships in this ferry business of ferrying these cars from the United States to Cuba, that they asked for no subsidy, that they could meet the competition of the British ship, but they could not meet the competition of the British ship if a subsidy were given.

All of the facts will be found on page 2956 of the RECORD of January 29, 1932, so forcefully presented by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET].

I appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and gave all of the facts in the case and invited an inspection of the correspondence between the office of the Comptroller General and the Postmaster General. The comptroller has held that the contract was in violation of the law.

When we arrived here in December and I heard about this contract being awarded to this company operating a British ship, I protested to the Shipping Board because they were then considering a loan to this company under the provisions of the merchant marine act. The original company was the Overseas Railway Co., and when the protest was made that it was a Canadian company, the contract was awarded to the Seatrain Co., which was a reorganization and is now an American corporation. Their ship was a British ship flying the British flag at the time the contract was awarded. Please bear that in mind.

All of this matter is a matter of record between the office of the Comptroller General and the Post Office Department. The Comptroller General has held that the contract is illegal.

I informed the Shipping Board that a protest would be made if a loan were authorized under this contract, because the postal contract, as you gentlemen know, is the basis for a loan. I very ill-advisedly released a copy of my letter to the Shipping Board to the press. A Congressman will do this sometimes. One young man of the press, not representing any of the large papers or any of the press associations, but representing a trade paper, rang up the Shipping Board that Saturday afternoon and asked them about it. He was told to wait and to ring up in 10 minutes. He did ring up in 10 minutes, and they said, "We have just awarded the loan," which was a loan of a little over $2,000,000 for each ship.

We have it within our power to stop this abuse. This contract has not taken effect. You will find on page 216 of the hearings that the Postmaster General stated to the committee, "Of course, that contract is not yet effective. It is not in operation." Since then I have ascertained—and this was only yesterday—that it is not yet in operation. I personally inquired at the Shipping Board and found that no money has been paid on the loan authorized.

Now, I submit to every Member who has the interests of American shipping at heart that if we want to carry out the purposes of the merchant marine act the way to do it is to stop abuses of this kind, because abuses of this kind some day will cause Congress to protest and repeal the act.

There is no question of competition involved here. It is just a matter of ferrying railroad cars, and they do not expect to carry any mail. The American company operating two American-built vessels is not asking for any subsidy. The Seatrain contract is not yet in operation.

I say we can serve notice on the Post Office Department and on the Shipping Board that we expect to scrutinize their administration of the merchant marine act, their expenditure of public funds which we appropriate, and I know of no better way than to adopt the amendment which I have offered, the contract being not yet in effect, and in this way stop the execution and consummation of this contract. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to call the attention of the committee to a communication which was called to my attention to-day. It is a report of Mr. Manson on February 20, 1932, to General President William L. Hutcheson, of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America.

I have received further information pertaining to work being done in the Orient on ships operated by the American Mail Line out of Seattle and San Francisco. These ships originally belonged to the Shipping Board Corporation and were sold to the Dollar interest. I have tried to find out the terms of contract and conditions of sale, and at this time I am at a loss to know what interest the United States Government has in these boats. These ships were well known as the President Line, and number about 10. Up to a few months ago our members in San Francisco and Seattle were employed on these ships when in port, doing most of the repairs and alterations. Now I am informed that this has all been changed and most of the work is being done abroad, which has a tendency to make the present bad conditions a little worse. The following is a list of jobs which is known to have been done on ships in the Orient recently:

Swimming tanks were constructed and placed on promenade deck of all these vessels.

A teak rail and bulkhead were constructed and installed around the promenade deck winches on all ships.

A number of the first-class state rooms were remodeled on most of the ships.

The Asiatic steerage in most of the ships has been repeatedly remodeled, and last month the ships began arriving with the whole of the steerage space in holds 8 and 9 remodeled into rooms.

The calking of decks on the ships is being done in the Orient continually. This work is done by taking on a crew of Chinese mechanics in Shanghai or Hong Kong and taking them along as a crew to Manila and back to their port of embarkation.

Any assistance that can be given in this matter will be greatly appreciated.

I call the attention of the House to what these big shipping companies are doing to help increase the unemployment in the United States.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I call the attention of the gentleman to page 69, section 7, of this bill, and ask the gentleman if he thinks that would stop such abuses?

Mr. CONNERY. Will the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut read it?

Mr. GOSS. I will.

SEC. 7. In the expenditure of appropriations in this act the Secretary of the Treasury in the case of the Treasury Department, and the Postmaster General in the case of the Post Office Department, shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase, or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. CONNERY. I would be in favor of that proposition.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman think it would cure this difficulty that he speaks of?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I do not think that would take care of it. That would not make them employ carpenters in the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, we had that question up when we were considering the merchant marine act, and we had the assurance by the steamship companies who have the subsidies that these abuses would not occur.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] will prevail. The facts surrounding the transaction sought to be effected by this amendment were set out by me in detail and brought to the attention of the House on January 29 of this year. The facts stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] are correct.

The contract sought to be effected, in my opinion, is not within the provisions of the law. The manner in which the purpose of this contract was sought to be effectuated was not accomplished in the manner provided by law.

While bids were asked for under the advertisement, it was impossible for any company to bid except the Seatrain Co. The conditions of the advertisement were such that no one could bid except that particular company. Therefore there was absolutely no competition in the granting of this mail award. And, gentlemen of the committee, I want to assure you that there was not then and there is not now any necessity for this particular service between New Orleans and Habana. If this contract is carried out, you will be wiping out of our merchant marine the only like service we have in this country which is financed from beginning to end by private American capital and a company which has received no subsidy from our Government nor asked for any.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And an American-built ship.

Mr. MONTET. Yes; an American-built ship. You will be absolutely wiping out of the Gulf trade that particular company. I hope, therefore, not only to serve notice on the Post Office Department and the Shipping Board that we are going to scrutinize their acts but in this day and time, when we are undertaking to practice economy, here is an opportunity to save $2,000,000. Why not do it?

The shipping trade between Habana and New Orleans does not need this particular service. If the service should be needed, we have an American company, with American capital, operated by Americans, ready to give us that service without the aid of a subsidy. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Does this company the gentleman speaks of have mail contracts?

Mr. MONTET. No; it has no mail contracts. Their business has been carried on without Government subsidy, and it is ready and willing to give the necessary car service between New Orleans and Habana. To that end that particular company made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a permit to operate between New Orleans and Habana. That permit has been granted. This same Seatrain line to which was granted this contract protested to the Interstate Commerce Commission the application of this other company upon the ground that the business between New Orleans and Habana did not justify any more service. In spite of that fact it prevailed upon the Post Office Department, taking an opposite position, that the requirements of the business justified their service.

Mr. FOSS. The company the gentleman speaks of would be willing to assume mail contracts, would it not?

Mr. MONTET. Yes. There is no necessity for it; and as I just stated, in the interest of economy and for the purpose of serving notice once and for all on these various departments that we will scrutinize their actions, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will prevail.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, much was said pro and con with reference to this particular contract in the hearings, and I confess that personally I was considerably impressed with what these gentlemen have had to say on the floor, but your committee was faced with this sort of a situation: The Postmaster General told us that he had entered into a contract. Of course, he made an explanation at some length of why he had done so. I invite the gentleman to read the hearings in order to have the other side of the proposition. The committee being faced with a contract which had been made by the Postmaster General under the law passed by the Congress, and faced with the further fact that in addition to this contract, which we were told had been duly signed, this particular Seatrain Co. had gone to the Shipping Board and had applied for a loan under the law and had been granted $5,250,000 to build two new additional ships, we felt there was nothing else for the committee to do save to make the appropriation necessary to carry out the contract. Otherwise, if the contract is a legal one, of course, the Seatrain Co. could go into the courts and enforce it against the Government.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Did the committee investigate the legality and the equity of the contract entered into?

Mr. BYRNS. It made the best investigation that it could. If the gentleman will examine the hearings, he will find them more or less extended with reference to this particular contract. The Postmaster General and the Second Assistant appeared and presented their side of the matter. Then Mr. Malone and possibly some other witnesses appeared and presented their side of the matter. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] appeared and made an able argument in support of the position he has taken here, and likewise the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET]. The committee did not undertake to pass upon the legality of the contract. As I stated, the Postmaster General is vested with authority to make these contracts, and the committee felt this way about it. The committee considered this matter very carefully with a view to seeing whether or not an appropriation would be carried. This appropriation is made in a lump sum. It does not refer to any particular contract. If this amendment of the gentleman from New York be adopted and the contract is legal, it is not going to have the slightest effect on what this Seatrain Co. can collect out of the United States Government. While the amendment does say that none of this particular appropriation shall be used for this contract, nevertheless, the gentleman as a good lawyer knows that if the contract is legal all it would have to do would be to go to the Court of Claims and collect the amount of the contract. Therefore, if it is a legal contract, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is not going to save one dollar. On the contrary, it will put the United States Government to the expense of having this matter go through the courts. If it is not a legal contract, the Comptroller General, of course, following his duty, will see to it that the money is not expended on this particular contract.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. COX. Are we to understand from what the gentleman says that his committee was impressed with the merits of this protest and that except for the fact that a contract had been made the committee probably would not have made the appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. I did not want to make that statement, because the members of the subcommittee are all on the floor at the present time and are thoroughly capable of speaking for themselves. I said so far as I was concerned I was impressed with the position taken by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], but I felt then and I feel now that in view of the fact that this matter has gone to the extent of having the contract made, and in view of the fact that the Shipping Board has passed a loan of more than $5,000,000 for the building of two ships, there was nothing for the committee to do except to make the appropriation.

There was nothing else, as I construe it and as the committee construed it, except to go ahead and make the appropriation to carry out not only this contract but all contracts that have been made by the Postmaster General under existing law.

The Postmaster General did say to this committee, as you will find in the hearings, that in regard to the one ship that has been in operation all along from New Orleans to Habana, he did not propose to spend any money until Congress had passed upon that proposition.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because it was a British ship?

Mr. BYRNS. Because it was and had been a British ship. That was his reason. Of course, the Postmaster General felt, as I understood him, that that did not affect the situation because the company was afterwards chartered under American law, but he stated that as far as that one ship was concerned he did not propose to spend any money, but with reference to the two new ships, of course he does.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am correct in stating that so far the contract has not been put into effect?

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is correct, except that this loan has been made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. No money has been advanced up to yesterday.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is right. I have stated the case to the House. As I say, the committee felt it would not be warranted in denying this appropriation upon a contract which had been legally entered into. Of course, if the House takes a different view, that is its responsibility.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. Did not the subcommittee also believe it was a question of basic policy, that Congress itself ought to determine by legislation?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is entirely right.

Mr. THATCHER. And that the Committee on Appropriations ought not to undertake to legislate on the question of policy involved?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is entirely right. We were simply following the law in making this appropriation.

Mr. MONTET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. MONTET. Did the Committee on Appropriations consider the legality or validity of the contract?

Mr. BYRNS. Not except as I have stated. We held extensive hearings.

Mr. MONTET. Then does the gentleman believe that if the contract is of doubtful validity, as I believe it is, in the event this Congress did control the appropriation in the manner sought to be effected by the gentleman from New York, the Seatrain Line would go to court and try to enforce collection?

Mr. BYRNS. Well, I do not know. I assume that the Seatrain Co. believes it has a legal contract, and I assume it would, because it is a very valuable contract, I have no doubt, as far as they are concerned.

Mr. MONTET. But does the gentleman believe that if the membership of this House feels that the contract, although effected by one department, is of doubtful validity or is illegal, it becomes our duty, even though we know the contract appears illegal, to make the appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no. If I thought the contract was illegal I would not vote for the appropriation. I do not know.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Comptroller General says it is not legal.

Mr. BYRNS. Then if that be true I assume he will not authorize the payment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNS) there were—ayes 59, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 57, at the end of the LaGuardia amendment, insert the following: "No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for contracting for repairing ships of the United States unless such contracts for repairing such ships shall be performed by citizens of the United States."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, my idea is to clear up the situation which I called to the attention of the House a few moments ago. These companies take on these crews at Hong Kong and they use foreign labor on repairing American vessels. I would like to see this stopped. With the unemployment situation in this country, we do not want American vessels, especially if they have subsidies from the United States, to take on foreign crews and give them work while we have plenty of men out of work in San Francisco, all over the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman would ban any repairs to a ship, that might be necessary in foreign ports, unless it could be made with American labor?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I think I would.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then they would be anchored there until American citizens were transported over there?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, I think we could find plenty of American citizens who are carpenters and mechanics in Hong Kong and Shanghai.

Mr. STAFFORD. But not in Siam or Australia or other ports around the world.

Mr. CONNERY. Besides, they have their own ship carpenters who can make emergency repairs on the ships. But that is not the idea. They are going over there and taking foreign labor to make permanent repairs with the idea of paying them small wages or wages that amount to nothing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, should we not require that all ships flying American flags shall only use Americans to man the ships?

Mr. CONNERY. Well, I would not be against that, either.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will recall the fight we had when the merchant marine act was before us. That law provides, as I recall, that 75 per cent of the crew shall be made up of American citizens, but the trouble is that the very companies which are now getting subsidies from the United States Government disregard the law and they not only carry Chinese crews but a reserve crew to take the place of the Chinamen who desert after they reach port.

Mr. OSIAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. OSIAS. Is the gentleman aware that there is an American navy yard in the Philippines and that being so would the amendment preclude the employment of Filipino laborers on those ships?

Mr. CONNERY. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that personally I am in favor of giving the Philippines their independence, and that would take care of the entire situation as far as the Philippines is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. OSIAS. That would suit me very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that does not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order, because while it is drawn in the form of a limitation it actually changes existing law, and may have the effect, and doubtless will have the effect, of changing existing contracts which have been entered into.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOWARD). In the view of the Chair the point of order is not good, and it is overruled.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I am only going to take two or three minutes. I do not think this amendment ought to be adopted. No matter what may be your opinion as to the real merits of it, let it come up as a matter of legislation.

Here we are asked, on an appropriation bill, to adopt an amendment which is purely legislation and which may, as a matter of fact, impair every contract the Government has entered into and subject the Government to a multitude of lawsuits on the part of every ship company which has a contract under this law.

I do not think, with the meager information we have, that we ought to adopt a drastic amendment of this sort.

Suppose a ship should go to Europe, to the African coast, or to the oriental coast and break down. What would happen? You could not even repair it under the terms of this amendment.

If you are going to adopt legislation of this kind, let us do it in an orderly way. Let it come from the proper legislative committee in the form of a legislative bill, when we can discuss it and safeguard it. But here you are asked to adopt an amendment and there is no man on the floor of this House who knows just where it will lead and just how it will affect the Government and the contracts which have been entered into.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I appeared before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having in charge this bill and proposed a limitation in the form of an amendment so as to provide that hereafter no ocean mail contracts should be awarded under the merchant marine act of 1928 to any company which is directly or indirectly operating foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships and also providing that no such contracts should be awarded to any industrial carrier—that is, a company engaged primarily in the transportation of its own products and not as a common carrier.

I understand in a general way that the committee declined to adopt this limitation on the ground that they considered it really a legislative matter. I have great respect and admiration for the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, my own colleague, and the other members of that committee, and ordinarily I would agree with them as to that. I myself am not in sympathy with the Appropriations Committee assuming legislative authority unless absolutely necessary. In this connection, however, I wish to call attention to the fact that during the last Congress I prepared and introduced a bill of the same character, except it did not embrace the industrial-carrier feature. The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries unanimously reported that bill; the Committee on Rules unanimously reported a resolution providing for the consideration of the bill; and it unanimously passed this House. Most of you gentlemen doubtless voted for it because nobody voted against it.

However, as meritorious as it was, and as strongly approved as it was at this end of the Capitol, it never became a law. It was smothered elsewhere through the influence of the Postmaster General, who desired to continue to exercise his power, and by the representatives of two of the lines which would be adversely affected by this American amendment. They are now fighting it. I want to state that I think I can safely predict that the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries will again report a bill of that character, and I believe the American Representatives in the House will again pass it.

However, as to what may result elsewhere, I am not now able to predict, and there would be a very strong, cogent reason for fastening a provision of this kind upon an appropriation bill which will pass and become a law, for this reason. After that bill to which I have referred, which provided nothing further than that thereafter an ocean mail contract should not be awarded to a company which was operating foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships—after it had unanimously passed the House, the Postmaster General requested the Senate committee to hold it up, and while it was pending in that committee, and before the committee had acted upon it, he awarded three mail contracts.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. While it was pending, and in order to circumvent, in the event it became the law, he awarded three contracts for the carriage of ocean mail, involving several millions of dollars of the people's money, and one of the contracts, under its terms, was not to become effective for three years, and one was not to become effective for two years, showing that he did this deliberately for the purpose of circumventing the very bill which was pending.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Would the gentleman care to name those three contracts?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; they were with the United Fruit Co., which was then and is now operating foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships, and which, in addition to that, is now earnestly and diligently seeking a $5,000,000 increase in its contracts, and which is not only operating foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships but which is an industrial carrier, and which is engaged primarily in the transportation of bananas and other fruit from the Tropics to the United States, where it has a virtual monopoly of the banana trade, as is known by all men.

And speaking about the lack of competition with respect to the Seatrain case, when these contracts were awarded during the pendency of that bill the specifications were worded in such a way that no other company could bid under the specifications except the United Fruit Co.

Mr. BACON. Could the gentleman give us the other two contracts?

Mr. DAVIS. I said there were three contracts awarded to the United Fruit Co.—all the same company.

Mr. KELLER. Who owns it?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, it is a very wealthy corporation.

Now, what else? These specifications were prepared and advertised and bids called for in such a way that nobody else could bid on it.

All of the United Fruit Co. ships are refrigerated; that is, they are air cooled for the purpose of carrying bananas and fruit, and they brought nothing into this country except that. So the specifications in the advertisement provided that the ships under the proposed contract should be all refrigerated. There was another line that was in that service, a 100 per cent American line, composed of American ships flying the American flag, operated by an American company, whose ships were much larger than the United Fruit Co. ships. They said:

> If you will amend the specifications so as to provide that the refrigerated space for each ship shall be fully as much as the total capacity of the United Fruit Co. ships, we can then refrigerate that space and bid upon the contract and have left a large amount of other space for the carriage of general cargo for other people as a common carrier.

But the Postmaster General refused to do this, and so there was no competition in the bids for this service.

Now, judging from his performance in the past, I want to say to the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, who are earnestly seeking to save—and I want to commend them for it—here is an opportunity, to my mind, to save several million dollars and do it not only in the interest of the taxpayer, but in the interest of an American merchant marine, because what assurance have we that he will not go along and accede to the request and the earnest efforts of the United Fruit Co. and give them an increase of $5,000,000 before we can get through Congress a general bill legislating upon the subject.

Now, what else? I want to say to those gentlemen who discussed the Seatrain proposition that that is insignificant. That is a baby compared with other things that have been done.

For instance, another company, and one that is fighting and will continue to fight American legislation of this kind, is the International Mercantile Marine, which has written contracts with the British Government, under which it contracts that it and its subsidiaries will do nothing injurious to the British trade or the British merchant marine, and the British Government reserves the right to cancel the contract if they do so, and so on. It is now operating 46 or 48 ships in the foreign trade owned by their subsidiary companies, which are incorporated under foreign countries, who have all foreign directors and officers and personnel on their ships, and who are under all the obligations of nationality, such as ships are generally with respect to countries, subject to seizure and all that sort of thing in case of national emergency.

It is operating 46 or 48 ships in the foreign trade, and it is operating 1 ship, the Minnekahda, under the American flag in the foreign trade.

In the meanwhile, this company had a subsidiary, called the American Line, which has three fine ships, for the construction of which they borrowed three-quarters from the Government at a low rate of interest, and these ships are engaged in the intercoastal service, operating between New York and San Francisco through the Canal Zone.

That is in a protected trade, because under our law, which has been a law from time immemorial, no foreign ships can operate in the coastwise or intercoastal trade of this country. That is the law in other countries with respect to their coastwise service.

Notwithstanding the fact that it is operating 46 or 48 times as many foreign ships in direct competition with the American ships as it is operating American ships, it has a contract for $418,000 a year for transportation of mail between New York and Balboa, two American ports, which is forbidden by the law. [Applause.]

If you want to stop contracts that are illegal, under which the Government is paying out large sums, there is one to operate upon. Now it wants additional contracts, so it is fighting legislation of this kind.

There is one more line I wish to mention, and that is the Munson Steamship Co., which, under this bill, is getting $1,690,000 a year for the transmission of mails in four ships between New York and South America. In addition to that, last year it operated 129 foreign ships, and the year before that it operated 150 foreign ships, and, of course, it is against this legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, now, strange as it may seem, these three foreign affiliated lines, which are serving two masters, if they are serving the American interests at all, have had more influence than the real American ship lines and they have had more influence than the taxpayers of the country. They have succeeded in having permitted the continuance of a policy that was never contemplated under the provisions of the merchant marine act of 1928. The whole purpose and spirit of that act, as stated in the first section, and repeatedly stated and shown all the way through, is solely for the purpose of building up the American merchant marine.

Whenever we put money into the coffers of companies who are so unpatriotic as to use their efforts to build up and operate foreign-flag ships in competition with American-flag ships, which American citizens are operating, I say that we have fallen on evil days. [Applause.]

Now, with the respect that I have for this distinguished committee, I dislike very much to offer an amendment to this bill, but I think I know that the members of this committee are favorable to the principle of the amendment. I think I know that they were prompted, as they say, by the other feature. But we are confronted with such a situation that if we wait until the ultimate passage of a general law, when certain interests are so powerful, commitments may be made that will cost the American taxpayers millions and millions of dollars. If this sort of policy is continued, I say that this whole structure is going to be torn down, the whole law will be repealed, because it is being prostituted and abused, and I am going to help do it. Those who are interested had better help clean house rather than tear down the house. I think most of us are for an American merchant marine, for a real honest-to-goodness merchant marine; we are not for any hybrid affairs, and we can not afford to stand for the people's money being diverted in such manner as is being done. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the other amendment I offered and offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS: Page 57, line 14, after the LaGuardia amendment, insert: "Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be used for the purpose of awarding, after March 1, 1932, an ocean mail contract under the merchant marine act, 1928, to or for extending or increasing an ocean mail contract now held by any person, firm, corporation, or association which directly or indirectly through any associate, affiliate, subsidiary, or holding company, or otherwise, operates as owner, agent, or charterer any foreign flag ships in competition with any American flag ships."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. It is certainly good to see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] back in his old form. [Applause.] It seems to me there can not be two sides to this question. We have legislated and provided funds to subsidize American shipping. The theory of that is to meet foreign competition. That is the reason we passed the merchant marine act of 1928, under the guise of postal contracts, because it was stated that American shipping could not meet foreign competition. We give a subsidy under the color of carrying mail. The payments are many times that of actual carrying mail on a poundage basis. Now, we are put in the ridiculous position, after only a little over three years of operation of this law, where we are simply handing out money to companies who are in agreement with foreign companies and who are dividing trade with foreign corporations and foreign shipping. Not only are these companies operating ships of foreign flag and registry but every one of these companies on the Atlantic is part of the conference with foreign-ship corporations outnumbered by them, and the conference arranges the schedules of sailings, the rates for freight, and for passenger service. I submit that if American companies are in agreement with foreign companies with an agreement to fix rates and sailings, there is no need of a subsidy. The case the gentleman pointed out of the Coast Line running from New York to San Francisco I took up with the comptroller in 1930. I have this complete report here and I shall put it in the RECORD if anyone desires it.

Mr. KELLER. Surely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was held there that the line from New York to Balboa and Colon was a fiction, but that it satisfied the requirements of the law to bring it within its provisions to obtain a postal contract. So, as the gentleman states, we have a line entirely coastwise, where there can be no foreign competition, receiving a subsidy on the fiction that it drops mail at one side of the canal to bring it over to the other side of the canal by rail operated by the United States Government. This is an absolutely dishonest taking of public funds. So that there can be no question about this; here is a full-page ad of shipping contained in the New York Times. You will find there advertisements of the International Mercantile Marine Co., No. 1 Broadway. They advertise the White Star Line, a British line; they advertise the Red Star Line, a Belgian company; the Atlantic Transport, a British company—all under the one management and the one company. Yet we are paying subsidies to the merger of which this same company is a part. There can be no question about that.

Only recently we had a merger of the International Mercantile Marine, the Roosevelt Line, the American Steamship Line, the Dollar Line, and some other lines on the coast into one company, and where did they go to merge? To the great seaboard State of Nevada! They are incorporated under the laws of Nevada.

Out in the State of Nevada the various steamship companies under the sharp vigilance of the British shipping interests organized and formed a company which not only took over the United States Lines, with its great German-built Leviathan, but prepared itself for juicy contracts and fat subsidies from the United States Government, and every British shipowner licked his chops. The British shipping interests have outsmarted American operators. They listen to P. S. A. Franklin's stale stories, pretend to enjoy them and laugh, and then put over anything they want. Why, the International Mercantile Marine Co. has been and now is absolutely directed entirely by British brains and British interests. The only ray of hope is that soon Mr. Kermit

Roosevelt will be able to take control of the merger, for he is a splendid American, a good business man, and is developing into a real shipping authority. American shipping is in good hands with Kermit Roosevelt, but I stop there when I refer to the whole International Mercantile Marine crowd. We must by our action to-day insist upon a complete severance of American shipping interests with foreign interests. If the conference is necessary, if agreements with foreign shipping are necessary, if arrangements with foreign shipping interests on schedules and rates are necessary, then I say that ship subsidy from the United States Government is not necessary. These conferences have been the most vicious, the most selfish causes of losses to American interests. I know from personal knowledge that American shipping interests get the worst of every agreement, arrangement, or decision of these so-called conferences in which American shipping companies go in with the foreign shipping interests.

I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee, Judge DAVIS, offered the amendment. I am for it. The amendment which I had prepared was more inclusive and even broader. The action of the House to-day will serve notice on American ship companies receiving the benefit of millions of dollars of subsidy from our Government that we expect them to build up an American merchant marine and to use the subsidy for that purpose and for the purpose of competing foreign competition. Any company which will accept a subsidy from the American Government and then operate foreign ships is not only stealing public funds but is guilty of betraying its own country. The purpose of the subsidy—and I call it a subsidy, as I have said before, though it is given under the guise of a postal contract—is to stimulate and encourage American shipbuilding, American operation of American ships under American command and an American crew. Let certain companies on the Pacific coast take heed, particularly the Dollar Line, that if the practice of using a Chinese crew, engaging in the smuggling of Chinese into the country, paying starvation wages to a Chinese crew, in that way practically encouraging the smuggling of narcotics, is continued, that the American Congress will not stand for it and will by legislation put an end to such practice. If the Davis amendment is adopted, it may cause some inconvenience to British stockholders and British shipping interests, to Belgian stockholders and Belgian ships, to Norwegian stockholders and Norwegian ships, to crimps, shanghaing, Chinese coolies for the crews of certain ships; but it will eventually reflect to the benefit of an American merchant marine. We are willing to appropriate and generally assist the development of a real merchant marine, but the American people have a right to expect that it shall be a real American merchant marine, American built and owned, American operated, and manned by Americans. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment be limited to 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am in entire accord in principle with what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has said. However, this presents a very serious legislative matter, and I think it would be fair to give the steamship lines the gentleman has mentioned an opportunity to be heard in their own defense. This is a legislative proposal that should not be added to an appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS. We held extensive hearings on that bill last year. Every one was invited to come. Some of the companies did come and appeared before the committee, and not a single solitary man who appeared there undertook to say that the bill was wrong or unsound in principle.

Everybody had full opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BACON. I agree absolutely with the gentleman in principle. I do not know anything about two of the lines which the gentleman from Tennessee mentioned, nor am I directly familiar with the International Mercantile Marine Co. and the Roosevelt Steamship Co., which the gentleman also mentioned, but through the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] I have been given a copy of a letter which the Roosevelt Steamship Co. addressed to the Shipping Board. In all fairness to them I would like to read one or two paragraphs from that letter:

When the Roosevelt interests merged with and acquired control of the International Mercantile Marine Co. it was definitely understood that the future development of the company would be under the American flag exclusively, and this was one of the principal including reasons for the merger.

I may say that the Roosevelt of the Roosevelt Steamship Co. is Mr. Kermit Roosevelt, son of President Theodore Roosevelt.

The International Mercantile Marine Co. is anxious to and will dispose of all its foreign-flag vessels just as soon as a reasonable business offer can be obtained for them. At the present time, due to world-wide depression, it is absolutely impossible, as the board well knows, to find a purchaser for these foreign ships, except at a distress figure.

As the company desires to invest the money obtained for this foreign-flag tonnage in American ships, it is to the interest not only of the company and its stockholders to obtain a fair price, but of the American merchant marine as well. We state as emphatically as it is possible to do so that not only will the company sell its foreign-flag ships at the earliest opportunity consistent with good business, with a view to investing the proceeds in American ships, but that it will be their fixed purpose not to purchase or contract any additional foreign-flag vessels.

Therefore, if it had not been for this depression, the International Mercantile Marine Co. would have been rid of every single foreign ship at this time. Because of the world depression, this amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] may force a group of fine Americans, who are trying to keep the American flag on the North Atlantic, to sell the remainder of their foreign-flag ships at ruinous prices.

I continue reading:

As a matter of fact, the company's present fleet of foreign-flag vessels averages about 14½ years of age, and as the commercial life of vessel property is 20 years, it is apparent that this foreign-flag fleet will disappear in any event over the next few years. Such replacements as are necessary to maintain trade the company expects to make with American steamers.

It is interesting to note that in November, 1918, the company received a very fair offer to sell all of their British-flag ships to a British syndicate, and that that sale was prevented by President Woodrow Wilson. Later, on November 26, 1918, the company was informed that the United States Government wished to purchase the company's British tonnage at the same price as that offered by the British syndicate, and a contract was prepared by the Shipping Board and was signed by the International Mercantile Marine Co.; but on April 1, 1919, the company was informed that the United States Government had concluded not to go ahead with their contract. The result of this was that through the interposition of President Wilson the sale of all the British tonnage of this line to a British company was prevented, and had the Government not interfered this company would have had no foreign ships at all. From that time on the International Mercantile Marine Co. did everything they could to dispose of their foreign-flag ships and were to some extent successful. In 1927 they succeeded in selling the White Star Line to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. As a matter of fact, since the war this company has disposed of 29 foreign-flag ships other than the White Star Line to a total tonnage of 217,405 tons. They have therefore sold a total of 55 foreign-flag ships since the war with a total tonnage of 617,405 tons. Then came the depression, and the few remaining ships under the foreign flags that they had could not be sold except at ruinous prices. Most of these remaining ships are old boats, averaging 14½ years of age, and it is my information that practically all, if not all of them, have been laid up and are not now being used. The company has stated to the Shipping Board that whatever price they may get for these ships will be put into new American-built boats. They therefore wish to hold them for a better market in order to get as big a price as possible.

The effect of this amendment will be to force the company to sell in the present demoralized shipping market at a loss to them. I submit in all fairness that this amendment, legislative in character, tacked on to an appropriation bill, will work a great hardship to an American company, all of whose officers and directors are Americans, and also, whose list of stockholders shows that more than 96 per cent of the total shares outstanding are owned by American citizens.

To attack this group of Americans who are trying to rehabilitate the American merchant marine at a time when the markets of the world are demoralized and when a depression exists all over the world, is to say the least unfair and unsportsmanlike. It seems to me they should be given a reasonable time to dispose of their few remaining foreign ships before a provision, such as the gentleman from Tennessee suggests, is made part of the permanent law. If the gentleman from Tennessee will bring in legislation to accomplish what his amendment seeks to accomplish, and will give this American steamship line a reasonable and fair time to dispose of what is left of their foreign-flag tonnage, I will be glad to support him and vote for his bill. As I stated in my opening remarks, I am in agreement with him 100 per cent but in the carrying out of that principle I believe in American fair play.

[Here the gavel fell].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by placing in the RECORD at this point the letter from the Roosevelt Steamship Co. addressed to the Shipping Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON]?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MARCH 23, 1931.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Referring to the hearing held by the board on March 2 last with respect to the Roosevelt-International Mercantile Marine Co. merger, we have, as requested, amplified our statement made at this hearing and have included below the additional information asked for by the members of the board.

1. The International Mercantile Marine Co. is a New Jersey corporation, owned and controlled by American citizens and operated in their interests and for their profit. The company and its predecessors in interest have been in the steamship business and have owned and operated American steamers since 1870.

The latest list of stockholders of the International Mercantile Marine Co. shows that more than 96 per cent of the total shares outstanding are owned by American citizens. This list is on file with our transfer agents and available to you if you wish.

2. The interests controlling the Roosevelt Steamship Co.—Mr. Kermit Roosevelt, Mr. John M. Franklin, Mr. Basil Harris, Mr. Vincent Astor, and their banking associates—have recently acquired and now own a working control of the International Mercantile Marine Co. This working control was purchased with the definite idea of acquiring a company with large cash resources, efficient and experienced management, and a world-wide freight and passenger organization, which would furnish the basis for a major development exclusively under the American flag. In addition, it was believed that the excellent facilities of the International Mercantile Marine Co., including offices in all important cities and splendidly located North River piers, would at once be of the greatest value to the American Pioneer vessels, both from the standpoint of soliciting and of handling freight.

Moreover, it was apparent that the control of the International Mercantile Marine Co. would make available at the appropriate time the finances necessary to make a substantial bid for the American Pioneer Line.

The Roosevelt Steamship Co. has maintained and will continue to maintain its corporate identity.

3. In July, 1930, when the merger of the Roosevelt-International Mercantile Marine interests was under consideration and before any action had been taken, full details of what was then proposed was stated before the Shipping Board at an informal hearing for the purpose of ascertaining whether the board saw any possible objection either in principle or with respect to the plan of the contemplated merger. After a full disclosure and discussion, the Shipping Board offered no criticism or objection other than that it would be ultimately necessary to dispose of all foreign-flag operations. Following this hearing before the board the merger has been carried to a conclusion, both as to principle and method, precisely as outlined to the board in July, 1930, for the express purpose of expansion under the American flag.

4. The International Mercantile Marine Co. owns both American and foreign-flag steamers, operating across the Atlantic and intercoastal. It has recently completed at Newport News, Va., three of the largest and finest ships built in the United States—the steamship California, steamship Virginia, and steamship Pennsylvania. These ships are now running in the California-New York trade, and cost in excess of $21,000,000.

The present depreciated investment of the company in American flag tonnage amounts to about $21,000,000. This compares with the company's present investment in foreign-flag tonnage of about $17,500,000. The American tonnage, however, consists in the main of practically new ships, whereas the foreign-flag ships average about 14½ years.

When the Roosevelt interests merged with and acquired control of the International Mercantile Marine Co., it was definitely understood that the future development of the company would be under the American flag exclusively, and this was one of the principal inducing reasons for the merger.

The International Mercantile Marine Co. is anxious to, and will, dispose of all its foreign-flag vessels just as soon as a reasonable business offer can be obtained for them. At the present time, due to the world-wide depression, it is absolutely impossible, as the board well knows, to find a purchaser of these foreign ships except at a distress figure.

As the company desires to invest the money obtained for this foreign-flag tonnage in American ships, it is to the interest not only of the company and its stockholders to obtain a fair price but of the American merchant marine as well. We state as emphatically as it is possible to do so that not only will the company sell its foreign-flag ships at the earliest opportunity consistent with good business, with a view to investing the proceeds in American ships, but that it will be their fixed purpose not to purchase or construct any additional foreign-flag vessels.

As a matter of fact, the company's present fleet of foreign-flag vessels averages about 15½ years of age; and as the commercial life of vessel property is 20 years, it is apparent that this foreign-flag fleet will disappear in any event over the next few years. Such replacements as are necessary to maintain trades the company expects to make with American steamers.

5. It might be well to recall to the board's attention the determined efforts which the International Mercantile Marine Co. has made in the past few years to dispose of its foreign tonnage and to acquire American tonnage.

Since 1918 the company has made every effort consistent with obtaining a fair price to sell its foreign-flag tonnage.

In November, 1918, the company received an offer from a British syndicate to purchase all its British tonnage, which offer was accepted by cable by the directors of the company after the United States Government had been consulted and had given its informal consent.

On November 18, 1918, however, the president of the company received the following letter:

WHITE HOUSE, November 18, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FRANKLIN: With regard to the sale to the British Government of the International Mercantile Marine, may I not request that no action be taken in the matter until the views of this Government are fully presented and considered?

Very sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

To this letter Mr. Franklin replied as follows:

NOVEMBER 20, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Your letter of the 18th instant was received this afternoon and it will be placed to-morrow before the board of directors of the International Mercantile Marine Co.

I beg to advise you that the action heretofore taken by our board in this matter was upon our understanding that it met with the approval of our Government and I feel sure that our board would not wish to take any further steps looking to the completion of the transaction that would be contrary to your wishes.

Sincerely yours,

P. A. S. FRANKLIN.

On November 21, 1918, Mr. Franklin wrote President Wilson that in response to his request the board of directors would take no action until the views of the United States Government were fully presented and considered and received.

The following reply from President Wilson:

NOVEMBER 25, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FRANKLIN: Allow me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 21 and to express my appreciation of the action of the board of directors of the International Mercantile Marine Co. in resolving to take no further action in the matter that has been under discussion until the views of the Government are fully presented and considered.

I hope and believe that I can give you the views of the Government in a very short time, because I realize that it is not fair to keep the board of directors in uncertainty.

With appreciation, sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Thus, in accordance with the request of the President of the United States the sale to the British syndicate was suspended.

On November 26, 1918, the Hon. Bainbridge Colby, then acting chairman of the United States Shipping Board, notified the company that the United States Government had decided to purchase the company's British tonnage at the same price as that offered by the British syndicate, and a formal contract of purchase was prepared by the Shipping Board and signed by the International Mercantile Marine Co.

But on April 1, 1919, the Hon. R. B. Stevens, vice chairman of the United States Shipping Board, advised the president of the company that the United States Government had concluded not to go ahead with its agreement to purchase the British tonnage, as conditions had changed.

The result of the whole matter was that the company failed to sell its British tonnage either to the British syndicate or to the United States Government. If the United States Government had not interfered with the sale of the company's foreign-flag tonnage to the British syndicate or if it had carried out its agreement to buy the company's foreign-flag tonnage, the company would not to-day have any foreign-flag tonnage.

6. In 1920 the company offered to purchase from the United States Government through the United States Shipping Board for operation under the American flag 30 ex-German steamers for the lump sum of $28,500,000 and to recondition them at an expenditure which would have at least equaled that amount. The only reason that this offer was finally rejected was that the Shipping Board was enjoined from selling the ships to anyone.

7. The company continued its effort to dispose of its foreign tonnage, and in 1927 was successful in selling the White Star Line, its principal foreign-flag property, to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. The sale involved approximately one-half of the company's foreign-flag ships from the standpoint of tonnage. The character and importance of these ships and of the White Star Line, however, make this sale much more significant than even the great tonnage involved and plainly demonstrated the company's policy to abandon foreign-flag operations. The foreign-flag vessels not included in this sale, while substantial in tonnage, were of minor importance compared with the White Star Line ships.

The form of the transaction above mentioned was a sale by the International Mercantile Marine Co. of all of the stock of the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co., known as the White Star Line, for approximately $35,000,000. Approximately $24,000,000 of this purchase price has been paid, and there still remains due from the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. the sum of about $11,000,000. The balance of this purchase price is secured by a lien or mortgage on the entire capital stock of the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. By this transaction the company disposed of 36 foreign-flag vessels of approximately 400,000 tons, including the Majestic, Olympic, and Homeric, which were by far the most important of the company's foreign tonnage.

All payments of principal and interest to date have been paid by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. when due.

At various dates since the war the company has disposed of 29 other foreign-flag ships of a total tonnage of 217,405 tons.

This makes a total of 55 foreign-flag ships disposed of since the war, with a total tonnage of 617,405 tons.

Despite diligent efforts, the company has been unable to obtain any substantial offer for the balance of any of its foreign-flag tonnage, and it is an utter impossibility in the present world-wide depressed condition of shipping to expect that a purchaser can be found immediately.

As previously stated, the company's present investment in American ships has grown to $21,000,000, whereas the value of the company's investment in foreign ships has dwindled since 1927 from $68,000,000 to $17,500,000.

8. As suggested, we attach a statement showing the various trades in which the ships owned by the International Mercantile Marine Co. or its subsidiaries are running. You will observe that none of the company's services compete with the American Pioneer Line.

In the New York-London trade the Atlantic Transport Line is maintained by the Minnekahda, flying the American flag, and by the Minnewaska and Minnetonka, under the British flag.

The Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. is a corporation organized under the laws of Maryland. Its total authorized capital is $10,000,000, of which amount $3,000,000 of preferred stock has been issued. The Roosevelt Steamship Co. has subscribed to a total of $750,000 of this preferred stock and has an operating agreement with the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. The International Mercantile Marine Co. has no service to Germany and, therefore, does not compete with the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co.'s service.

The Antwerp service controlled by the company has been largely responsible for making possible the present operating arrangement which has worked out so satisfactorily for the American Diamond Line. The company has been very glad to cooperate with the board in connection with this service and believes that this cooperation has been of great value to the board.

9. We also attach a copy of the latest consolidated balance sheet of the International Mercantile Marine Co. It will be observed that the foreign-flag companies are carried on the company's books as an investment in the sum of $20,153,000. In this amount there is an ample cash reserve. This investment has been completely segregated and is not dealt with as a part of steamship operations. It is treated precisely like any other investment made by the company in outside securities. The loss or profit on the investment will be a capital loss or gain, and has nothing to do with the company's American steamship operations. We repeat, this investment will be disposed of at the earliest possible moment.

None of the earnings from American-flag vessels have been, or will be, utilized in connection with the investment in the foreign-flag tonnage. On the contrary, just as soon as the foreign-flag vessels are sold these funds will become available for purchase of American tonnage.

10. In considering this whole question it should be borne in mind that the company's original purchases of foreign-flag ships were made at a time when there was no construction-loan fund or adequate mail compensation available to make possible the successful operation of steamers under the American flag in the foreign trade. In the situation then existing the company had to operate either foreign-flag ships or no ships at all. If it had not engaged in the steamship business with foreign ships, its experience and resources would not now be available in building up an American merchant marine.

The recent change in conditions which now makes possible, for the first time, operation under the American flag came about at a time when this company found itself with a large amount of foreign-flag tonnage on its hands and in a period of great world depression in shipping. It has been impossible for the company to change overnight under such conditions, although great progress has already been made and the end is clearly in sight.

It is obviously not in the best interests of the company, nor of the future of the American merchant marine, for this company to deplete its resources by unreasonable sacrifices of its remaining foreign-flag tonnage, because every such sacrifice would mean just so many dollars less which the company would have for the purchase of American-flag ships.

We submit that the American mercantile marine has been strengthened, actually and potentially, by the Roosevelt-International Mercantile Marine merger.

We believe that the company as to-day constituted is an alert, efficient, and experienced organization, which is fast approaching a position in which it can play a great part in the development of American shipping.

It must be apparent that any lack of sympathetic understanding of the great problem with which this company has been faced and which it has already largely met can only result in unnecessary injury to the company, its stockholders, and to the Nation, and prevent a group of earnest American shipping men from carrying to a successful conclusion a major development exclusively under the American flag, already under way.

Very truly yours,

ROOSEVELT STEAMSHIP CO. (INC.).

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the development of the merchant marine. I voted for the celebrated White Act, and in every way cooperated to have the American flag flown on the seven seas. But in this proposition suggested in the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] we are going into legal questions.

Many of the amendments offered this afternoon should really have been submitted to the Attorney General for opinion. We of the Committee on Appropriations do not claim to be a committee of lawyers, nor are we supposed to pass on the legality of contracts. The gentleman from Tennessee has stated that legislation was introduced by him but not successfully passed in the last Congress. So the gentleman comes here and hopes by means of a rider, skillfully drawn, which provides a limitation, to put into effect legislation that he was unable to pass in the last Congress.

The question is, Is the Government going to keep the faith? We believe in the sanctity of a contract between individuals in industrial and commercial life. Is the Government going to keep the faith as they expect individuals to keep it? It has been held, in the interpretation of this rider, that contracts entered into for a 10-year period to carry the mails would not receive an appropriation for the next year or the ensuing years on these contracts, owing to the effect of this rider.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I regret I can not. I have only five minutes.

Are we going to have the Government be unfaithful to its contract? Shall it be said that the United States has entered into a contract with citizens in good faith and then violated that contract? The fleets of many of these companies that have mail contracts were purchased from the Shipping Board, and they were purchased alone on the proviso that a mail contract would go with them.

Now, after the Government has sold those fleets to the steamship men and given them a 10-year mail contract, they want to come in and say, "Oh, we have sold you the fleet; you are carrying the bag. We got rid of it. Now we will get after you by cutting off the appropriation to be paid for the carrying of the mail." Is that fair? Is that just? Is that equitable? Will that reflect credit upon our Government?

Why not let the gentleman from Tennessee bring in a bill in the regular way from his own committee, and give these people a chance to be heard, and then if the Congress sees fit to pass the bill, well and good, but do not try to legislate indirectly by putting a rider of this kind on an appropriation bill.

The gentleman speaks about the Munson Steamship Co. of New York. That is an American company. They took over the management of our barge canal in the State of New York, and did it satisfactorily and well. Gentlemen, this is a fight between certain steamship companies that have purchased Shipping Board fleets, who have no foreign-flag vessels, and those companies that operate for the time being both lines. It is the old fight of the Mississippi Steamship Co. against the Munson Steamship Co. in the State of New York. It is unfair and unjust to these companies, and it is in violation of all law of equity and justice and right. Are we simply going to legislate because we have the power? Is it going to be a question of might making right? I think it would be unfair to the precedents established by those who have gone before us to pass legislation of this kind. If you want it, get it in the regular way and not by the devious, subterranean method of a rider, which is unfair because it is strictly one-sided; it does not give both sides an opportunity to be heard. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] submitted his rider to the Appropriations Committee, who rejected it. Now he tries to fasten it on the bill in committee.

Surely, gentlemen, this is a most unscientific way to legislate. Many Members are not familiar with this subject; the time for debate has been limited to a very few minutes, not enough to explain satisfactorily the points at issue.

When American companies, owned entirely by American citizens, made purchases of Shipping Board fleets under contracts to operate the fleets in specific trades, no such limitation as contemplated by this rider was even thought of. These companies believe that any such enactment affecting those holding existing contracts would tend seriously to impede their progress and perhaps to impair their very existence, not to mention the adverse effect upon their obtaining credit from banks and others.

In the light of all these facts I sincerely trust that the amendment will not prevail and that the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] will bring in his legislation in the form of a bill so that it can be fully considered in the regular manner. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in my opinion there is no amendment that has been offered before this body since it assembled in December that means more to the American Government than the amendment offered by the chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee. I am on that committee. I am a new member, but I have seen enough in our investigation of the affairs of the merchant marine and in the handling of the money the Government has appropriated for the building up of the merchant marine, not only in the loaning of money to build ships but also in the way of mail contracts, to come to the conclusion that the suggestion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] should receive the serious consideration of every Member of this House.

The original idea of the merchant marine act was to do what? It was to build our merchant marine, to be owned by American capital, to be used to carry merchandise made by American manufacturers, and also to be used as an auxiliary of the Navy in case of great emergency.

What justification have we for loaning money to a shipping company owned by foreign capital, and what business is it of ours to award a mail contract to a foreign-owned company in competition with an American-owned company? I can not see any sense in it whatever. It looks ridiculous to me. I hope the amendment passes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anyone here to-day who has any doubt whatever of my interest in the establishment of an American merchant marine. The fact is that I introduced the first bill at the time we were considering various bills for the establishment of an American merchant marine, and a portion of that bill is embodied in the present law. That law as passed did not suit me, as it did not suit many other Members of the House, but it was the best we could get under the circumstances. That it is defective we are all willing to admit, after the years it has been put into practical operation. But the very fact that it is defective and the fact that those defects have been proven, by reason of its application in practice, is all the more reason why the correction of those defects should be undertaken deliberately and after full knowledge of what we are doing. I think that all of you who listened to the able address made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] concluded that there is so much involved in this amendment that some legislative committee ought to consider it from beginning to end, especially in view of the interests which are affected. I do not think anyone here wants to do the American merchant marine any injury.

I want to call your attention to the fact that in 1915 we had no merchant marine. There were no merchant vessels plying the seas. There was just one on the Pacific Ocean, and that is all. However, since the war and by reason of the war we have realized the necessity of having an American merchant marine, and we set about building one.

When we passed a law providing for the establishment of an American merchant marine, who was going to invest their money in it? It was the men who were in the shipping business at the time, men who knew something about the game. They were the owners of vessels and, of necessity, they were at that time under foreign registry. Ever since that time they have been trying to get out from under that foreign registry, and most of them would have succeeded in doing that completely had it not been for the world-wide depression we are in.

You take the United Fruit Co. It had 56 vessels under foreign registry at the time the merchant marine act was passed.

These have been reduced more than one-half. I hold no brief for the United Fruit Co., but their business is largely in South and Central America and, as has been said, they are largely engaged in the raising and transporting of bananas to the United States. Of necessity, they have to have some of their vessels under registry with the South and Central American Republics in order to do business in those countries. Are you going to destroy all the good they are doing the United States simply because of the fact that of necessity, and in order to transact their business, they have to register some of their ships in this way. Are you going to wipe them out of business on this account? I do not think this is fair, and I do not believe the gentlemen here will consider it fair.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has said that he introduced a bill at the last session of Congress and that it passed unanimously, but this amendment is not that bill. It was different from his now proposed amendment, as the gentleman admitted when he had the floor; and sitting here as a Committee of the Whole we should be very careful about the application of this Holman rule, and if it were not for the Holman rule the amendment would be subject to a point of order. Therefore we should be very careful in passing legislation upon appropriation bills for fear of the very thing I am telling you now. We are liable to hurt some one.

If this amendment becomes law you are going to make it impossible for any modification or any change in the contract, either for the benefit of the United States or for the benefit of the shipowners. There are millions and millions of dollars invested in this matter and I want to say to you gentlemen that I want to see a merchant marine for the United States established upon a sound and substantial basis, and I ask that you do not do anything at this time by legislating upon an appropriation bill that you will have cause to regret.

You will never know the benefit that this merchant marine has been to the people of the West and to the people all over this country in furnishing them an avenue through which they could ship in American bottoms. So do not hurt this industry now by this legislation; be fair and let all parties interested have a chance to be heard.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are 6 minutes remaining which I had asked for in order to conclude the debate; and inasmuch as we can do this by unanimous consent, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN] may have 2 minutes of that time and then I shall conclude in the 4 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening very attentively to this debate as it has gone along this afternoon. If there is one man more than another that stands on the floor of this House for the benefit of an American merchant marine, with no egotism on my part, I may say it is myself. I have worked in every way to promote the American flag upon the seven seas of the globe. [Applause.]

I have great respect for the chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee [Mr. DAVIS], whose judgment on these matters I fully recognize, but there is now a simple problem before the House. Are we going to abrogate contracts that the Government has made with these shipping people because of some damage that may be done by some American or foreign ships?

We have entered into a direct contract with the Government and just as my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] has said, these shipowners are willing and ready to dispose of their ships and bring them under the American flag as fast as they can do so.

I do not think you gentlemen are now going to sit here and destroy the shipping industry altogether just because a few foreign ships are carrying the mail. These foreign ships that are carrying the mail to-day were purchased by American shipowners and they are going to take that flag off of them as soon as they can, and therefore we ought not to put ourselves in the position of destroying contracts that the Government has made with these American citizens by destroying their contracts relative to carrying the mail. I know very well that you gentlemen are now going to do this, and I hope that the amendment will not pass. If we are to have legislation, let us bring it in in a proper manner and consider it in a proper parliamentary way.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, Mr. CULLEN, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. BOYLAN, are both laboring under a misapprehension. The amendment does not in any wise affect or attempt or purport to affect any existing contracts. On the contrary, it says this:

Provided further, That no part of these funds shall be used for the purpose of awarding, after March 1, 1932, an ocean mail contract—

And so forth.

In other words, it simply forbids the future awarding of contracts, and does not in any respect affect any existing contract. So that answers the argument made by these two gentlemen.

You have adopted an amendment which does affect a contract, but I do not undertake to do that in the amendment I propose, and do not want to be as drastic unless it becomes necessary.

Mr. BACON. I want to call to the attention of the gentleman that the International Mercantile Marine Corporation does want to sell its ships, but they could not sell them by March of next year.

Mr. DAVIS. The International Mercantile Marine Corporation has been saying that for years. I asked the president a year ago why they did not cancel the contracts with the British Government. They have not undertaken to do so—they have made no effort to do so. They can to-morrow transfer every one of their foreign-flag ships to American registry if they want to, and provided their master, Great Britain, will permit them to do it.

During the World War they made a tentative deal to sell their vessels to the United States, but Great Britain, our own ally, refused to permit them to be transferred to American registry, and so the deal was not consummated. That is the situation they are in. You are defending men who have boldly and defiantly made and maintained these contracts and operated a large number of foreign-flag ships, and yet obtained a mail contract in violation of the law. That is doubtless due to the fact that J. P. Morgan & Co. are the chief stockholders. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Indiana defends the United Fruit Co. and says that they could not operate the ships unless under foreign flags. I deny that such is the fact. This amendment does not keep any of them from operating all the ships they want to under any flag which they wish. It simply says if they do operate under a foreign flag, they must go to them for help and not expect the American taxpayers to put up the money for them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD), there were 70 ayes and 58 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the Davis amendment, just adopted, insert:
"Provided further, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any company having a contract under the merchant marine act of 1928 which carries a foreign crew in violation of law or which contracts for repairs other than emergency work in foreign countries."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and interferes with the discretion of an executive officer.

Mr. BYRNS. And upon the further ground that a similar amendment has already been voted upon this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not exactly a similar amendment. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered now to take care of the objections which were raised to the other amendment offered a while ago. This allows repairs to be performed on our ships in a foreign port if they are emergency repairs, such as was referred to by some one as the breaking of a propeller or anything of that sort.

At the same time it prevents these ships from going to Hong Kong, Shanghai, or a foreign port, taking on foreign crews, then going to Manila, and while en route having this crew perform work such as changing staterooms, remodeling staterooms, building guard rails—in other words, permanent repairs—which should be done on the Pacific coast, in Seattle or San Francisco, by American workmen. I have no desire to offer any amendment which would prevent these ships from doing emergency repairs such as the repairing of a propeller or the repairing of engines. I do not believe they should be allowed to employ foreign laborers for permanent repairs when those repairs should be done in the United States by American workmen, and can be done here.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, as I said a while ago on an amendment similar to this, this is but another step toward putting legislation on an appropriation bill without consideration upon the part of the committee and without knowledge on the part of the House. I think matters of this importance ought to be left to the legislative committee, so that it could bring in a bill, if such a bill is necessary, which has been fully considered by that committee and which we will be certain will not run the chance of impairing existing contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 24, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS: Page 57, line 3, strike out "$38,816,000," and insert "$38,695,600."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in view of the action taken this afternoon by the committee in striking out of the bill the appropriation which will be necessary for the so-called Seatrain contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For balances due foreign countries, $1,400,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOWARD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9699 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, for the day, on account of illness.

Mr. DRAIN, for two days, on account of illness.

Mr. PATTERSON, for one week, on account of the illness of his son.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 2, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

MOTION TO DISCHARGE COMMITTEE

FEBRUARY 25, 1932.

To the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

Pursuant to clause 4 of Rule XXVII, I, J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, move to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1932

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who in the quiet light of Thy counsel revealest all things in the slow history of their ripening and showest Thy will in the inmost and ultimate harmony of the world; save us from the blight which rests upon the unasking soul that is never bowed down before Thee, and bestow upon us the refreshing dew of the spirit of worship which shall minister to our cleansing and uplifting that we may lay hold of the higher strength which lies about us and entertain the secret presence waiting at our door. Temper our hearts that life may show us its real friendliness amidst its harsh severities, its real worth amidst its disappointing scenes, its high dignity and spiritual ministry amidst all that tends to overthrow its wholesome discipline. Live Thou in us this day and grant that whatever we do may be done to Thy honor and glory and in utter conformity to Thy blessed will. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

R. 7230) providing for uniform pensions for widows, children, and dependent parents of certain war veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of Meriden Post, No. 45, of Meriden, and William H. Gordon Post, of Greenwich; the New Canaan Post, of New Canaan; Groton Post, No. 114, of Groton, all of the American Legion; and the Hartford Chapter, Reserve Officers Association of the United States, of Hartford, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties and opposing the proposed reduction in appropriations for the War Department, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions and papers in the nature of petitions of the Kiltonic Post, of Southington; Groton Post, No. 114, of Groton; Horace J. Tanguay Unit, of Thompsonville; Stanley Dobosz Post, of Rockville; Shaw-Sinon Post, of Wallingford; Darrow Unit, of Guilford; Coyle Post, of Waterbury; and George Alfred Smith Post, of Fairfield, all units of the American Legion Auxiliary in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties and also the establishment of a World War veterans' committee of the Senate, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COSTIGAN presented memorials signed by 261 citizens of the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or other restrictive religious measures, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented memorials and papers in the nature of memorials of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dolores, by Mrs. Clara B. Jones, president, representing 35 members; the Englewood Community Church, of Englewood, by R. H. McVickers, pastor, representing 105 people; the Dry Creek Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Lamar, by Mrs. Hazel Harknen, recording secretary, representing 100 people; the Eames Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Denver, by Alice L. Welton, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Gertrude Blakesley, president, representing 50 people; the Ladies' Aid Society of Dolores, by Ruth Shields, secretary, representing 40 people; the Woman's Missionary Federation of Denver, by Mrs. E. J. Campen, president, and Mrs. L. J. Phillips, secretary, representing 15,000 people; the Church of the Brethren of Haxtum, representing 250 people; the First United Presbyterian Church of Loveland, by J. Clyde Mahaffey, pastor, representing 370 people; the First Congregational Church of Lyons, representing 50 people; the Bethlehem Lutheran Ladies' Aid of Longmont, representing 32 people; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Willard, representing 35 people; the First Presbyterian Church of Loveland, representing 220 people; the Northern Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church of Pueblo, by George L. Williams, pastor, representing 400 persons; the Church of God, by A. G. Ahrendt, pastor, of Olathe; the Olathe Methodist Episcopal Church of Olathe, representing 70 people; the First Baptist Church of Olathe, by Charles B. Lewis, pastor, representing 110 people; the Methodist Episcopal Church of Loveland, by John R. Creamer, minister, representing 300 people; the Clifton Christian Church, of Clifton, by George E. Jones, pastor, representing 300 people; the Baptist Auxiliary of Dolores, by Mrs. Helen E. Starkey, secretary, representing 34 people; and 61 citizens of Boulder, all in the State of Colorado, remonstrating against the proposed resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by State conventions or legislatures, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX—FUNDS FOR CROP PRODUCTION

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I present certain resolutions of the legislature of my State. They are short, and I would like to have them read and referred to the proper committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the resolutions? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution to memorialize Congress not to place any tax on gasoline

Whereas Congress of the United States has under consideration legislation the purpose of which is to place a Federal tax upon gasoline; and

Whereas the State tax imposed upon gasoline sold in South Carolina is at the present time 6 cents per gallon; and

Whereas taxes on gasoline is a matter which has been and should be left to the legislative bodies of the various States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of South Carolina hereby respectfully memorializes the Members of the House of Representatives from South Carolina and the Members of the Senate from South Carolina to use their influence to prevent Congress from passing any legislation whereby the Federal Government shall place a tax upon gasoline; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Members of Congress from South Carolina.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S. C., February 29, 1932.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

[SEAL.] J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

A concurrent resolution calling to the attention of the Congress of the United States of America the urgent credit need of the farmers of this State and memorializing the Congress for action in respect thereto

Whereas due to the unusually low prices of the principal cash crops of South Carolina the total value of all crops declined from $140,744,000 in 1928 to $71,214,000 in 1931, thus reducing to a very low level the amount of cash in the hands of farmers; and

Whereas two large chain banking systems, consisting of 53 banks, and several independent banks, all of which were located in the smaller towns, have failed within the last three months, thus cutting off the most important source of credit heretofore available to farmers; and

Whereas credit from the remaining banks is limited and will be difficult to obtain and merchant credit will be expensive and difficult to secure; and

Whereas the cropping season for our principal crops comes earlier than in most States, the credit needs of farmers of South Carolina are particularly great and immediately pressing; and

Whereas the absolute need for fertilizers, for certain supplies for many tenants, for the replacement of greatly depleted work stock and equipment, is very great and urgent: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That it is the sense of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina that this State's proportionate part of the $50,000,000 provided for crop production under House Resolution No. 7360 of the United States Congress, providing emergency financing facilities for financial institutions to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and for other purposes, is, under present distressing conditions, totally inadequate to meet the needs of this State; be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall secure the additional $150,000,000 as provided for in section 9 of this act; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each Senator and Representative of this State in Congress now assembled at the Capitol of the Nation; be it further

Resolved, That they be urged to use every means with the directors of the corporation to hasten the selling of the bonds in order that the agricultural interests of the country may be furnished this greatly needed assistance in time to produce this year's crops, because delay will in a large measure prevent any benefit that might come from the operation of the act.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S. C., February 29, 1932.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

[SEAL.] J. WILSON GIBLES,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to state in connection with the last resolution read that since it was adopted by the State legislature there has been an additional $25,000,000 added, so as to make the amount now available $75,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first resolution of the South Carolina Legislature will be referred to the Committee on Finance; the resolution last read will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PROPOSED FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, some days ago I had inserted in the RECORD the names of persons who had sent messages to me protesting against the imposition of a Federal tax on gasoline. I desire now, with the permission of the Senate, to make a brief statement relative to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, many of the States have already in force comparatively heavy taxes on gasoline. In the list of States that have imposed such a tax is the State of Arkansas. It would be difficult without greatly hampering commerce to increase the rate that is now being levied in that State.

Various messages have been received by myself, since those referred to on a former occasion, from citizens and organizations, all in the State of Arkansas, strongly protesting the imposition of a Federal gasoline tax. Among those are included telegrams from J. Marion Stafford, secretary and manager of the chamber of commerce at Stuttgart; Messrs. Buford Compton and Buford Tatum, of Danville; Shirley & Darnell, of Charleston; F. F. Justiss, of Eldorado; A. Hester, of Nashville; John W. Ellis, of Camden; John M. Bransford, representative in the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas from Lonoke County, of Lonoke; R. E. Fakes, of Lonoke; R. D. Bishop, of Lonoke; N. D. Early and many other citizens of Stuttgart; Harvey Parnell, Governor of the State of Arkansas; C. W. Westmoreland, of Magnolia; W. H. Evans, of Little Rock; R. G. Hudson, of Hot Springs; McGregor & Pickett, of Little Rock; M. C. Butler, of Arkadelphia; Ira B. Foster, of Pine Bluff; A. M. Yeary, of Brinkley; W. M. Rogers, Robert G. Motley, E. E. Dennis, and J. T. Rhodes, all of Little Rock; A. G. Boyd, of Pine Bluff; Daniel Harder Post, the American Legion, of Stuttgart; L. Krumpen, jr., and other citizens of Stuttgart; S. J. Lowe, jr., of Stuttgart; Conn Hardware Co., by J. E. Young, also of Stuttgart.

I ask that the telegrams be received and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 284) for the relief of William B. Thompson, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 360) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Finance, to which were referred the following bill and joint resolution, submitted adverse reports thereon:

S. 1675. An act to amend section 19 of the World War veterans' act (Rept. No. 361); and

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution extending the benefits of section 202 (10) of the World War veterans' act (Rept. No. 362).

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction, with a view to increasing employment, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 363) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to intoxicating liquors; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RETIREMENT INSURANCE FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to provide retirement insurance for railway employees, and for other purposes, which has been approved by the Railway Labor Executives' Association. I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3892) to provide retirement insurance for railway employees, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3892

A bill to provide retirement insurance for railway employees, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

ARTICLE I

DEFINITIONS

SECTION 101. When used in this act and for the purposes of this act—

First. The term "carrier" includes any carrier by railroad, express company, and sleeping-car company, or other operator of transportation facilities subject to the railway labor act, and any subsidiary or auxiliary transportation service used by or operated in connection with such a carrier.

Second. The term "employee" includes every person in the service of a carrier who is included within the definition of "employee" in the railway labor act, and specifically includes all persons commonly described as "furloughed employees," meaning those not actively employed but subject to call for employment and maintaining rights of employment under contracts governing terms and conditions of employment entered into between representatives of carriers and their employees, in accordance with the provisions of the railway labor act. The term "employee" also includes the officers or other official representatives of any organization of the employees of a carrier who have been duly designated and authorized to represent them under and in accordance with the provisions of the railway labor act, and who, during or following employment by a carrier, are engaged in such representative service in behalf of the employees of said carrier.

Third. The term "board" means the railway employees' retirement insurance board created by this act.

Fourth. The term "commission" means the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Fifth. The term "commencement date" means the date which is hereby fixed as six months after the effective date of this act, upon which carriers and employees become liable to contribute to the funds established by this act on the basis of compensation payable to the employees for services performed on and after said commencement date.

Sixth. The term "contributory service" means that service performed by an employee for a carrier on and after the "commencement date" defined and fixed in this act.

Seventh. The term "prior service" means that service performed by an employee for a carrier prior to said "commencement date."

Eighth. The term "age" means age at the latest attained birthday.

OBLIGATIONS—PURPOSE—EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 102. In order to promote and increase the safety and efficiency of interstate transportation service, it shall be the duty of all carriers and employees subject to this act to accept and to fulfill the obligations herein imposed upon them for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a system of retirement insurance under which the rendition of personal services can be maintained at a high grade of efficiency with due regard for the general welfare.

This act may be cited as the railway employees' retirement insurance act and shall become effective on the first day of the second month following the date of its passage.

EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT ANNUITY

SEC. 103. Every employee of a carrier upon becoming eligible to retirement, or exercising a privilige of retirement, as hereinafter provided, shall be entitled to receive for the remainder of his life an annuity, payable in monthly installments, in conformity with and under the terms and conditions of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 104. The amount of annuity to which each employee shall be entitled on retirement shall be determined by the payment of contributions by carriers and employees, which shall be calculated, as nearly as may be, to produce an annuity equal to 2 per cent of the average annual compensation of each employee multiplied by the number of years of the employee's contributory service, plus an additional annuity as a reward for the employee's prior service, in the amount hereinafter provided.

The Railway Employees' Retirement Insurance Board created by this act shall be charged with its administration. The ways and means of establishing and maintaining the funds necessary to provide for the payment of the annuities and other disbursements herein provided, and the amount of annuities payable at various ages of retirement, together with other details of the administration of this act, are hereinafter set forth, particularly in Article II of this act, under the caption "Schedule of Standards of the Board," and it shall be the duty of the board to administer this act in substantial compliance with such standards. The board may, however, from time to time, after due investigation, make a report to the Interstate Commerce Commission proposing any modification of, or supplements to, any of the requirements or provisions of said schedule which the board may deem helpful to the administration of this act or necessary or advisable to accomplish its declared objects and purposes. If, after giving public notice of said proposals and a hearing thereon (upon application) to any party whose rights or obligations are affected thereby, the commission shall issue its order approving the proposed modifications or supplements to said schedule as helpful to the administration of this act or necessary or advisable in order to accomplish the objects and purposes of this act, said modifications and/or supplements shall thereby be established in full force and effect as though originally written in the said schedule in this act.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT INSURANCE BOARD

SEC. 105. There is hereby established, as an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government, a board to be known as the Railway Employees' Retirement Insurance Board and to be composed of five members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The terms of office of the members first taking office shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination and as hereinafter provided, respectively at the end of the second, third, and fifth years after the effective date of this act. The terms of office of all successors shall expire five years after the expiration of the terms for which their predecessors were appointed; except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of his predecessor. Vacancies in the board shall not impair the powers, nor affect the duties of the board, nor of the remaining members of the board, of whom a majority of those in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(a) Two members of the board shall be appointed (initially for respective terms of three and five years, and thereafter both for terms of five years) from recommendations made, in such manner as the President shall direct, by the representatives of the employees, duly designated and authorized to act in conformity with the requirements of the railway labor act, so as to provide substantially for representation on the board satisfactory to the largest possible number of employees concerned.

(b) Two members of the board shall be appointed (initially for respective terms of three and five years and thereafter both for terms of five years) from recommendations made, in such manner as the President shall direct, by the representatives of the carriers so as to provide substantially for representation on the board satisfactory to the largest number of carriers concerned.

(c) The fifth member, who shall be the chairman of the board, shall be appointed (initially for a term of two years and thereafter for a term of five years) without recommendation by either carriers or employees and shall not be pecuniarily or otherwise interested in any carrier or organization of employees, and shall possess mature experience in financial and insurance matters.

(d) Each member shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum, together with necessary traveling expenses and subsistence expenses or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, subject to the provisions of law applicable thereto, while away from the principal office of the board on business required by this act.

(e) A member of the board may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, malfeasance in office, or ineligibility, but for no other cause.

(f) Each member of the board shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, to take acknowledgements and to issue subpœnas. The board shall have a seal which shall be judicially noticed. All decisions of the board shall require the approval of at least three members and shall be entered upon the records of the board and shall be public documents. The board shall make an annual report to Congress. The board shall maintain central offices in Washington, D. C., but may meet at any other place whenever it deems this necessary, and may designate one or more of its members to conduct hearings, to take testimony, and to make reports to the board.

(g) The board may (1) appoint such experts and assistants to act in a confidential capacity and engage such other officers and employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, giving preference, wherever possible, to eligible employees subject to this act but unemployed; and (2) fix the salaries of such experts, assistants, officers, and employees; and (3) make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent, for personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals and books of reference, and for printing and binding and for salaries, compensation, and necessary traveling expenses and expenses actually incurred for subsistence) as may be necessary for the execution of the functions vested in said board. All expenditures of the board shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman. Witnesses summoned before the board shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE BOARD

SEC. 106. The board shall have and exercise all the powers and duties necessary to administer the act in accordance with its provisions and to accomplish the objects and purposes thereof; and particularly—

(a) It shall be the duty of the board to demand and to compel the payment of all contributions of carriers and employees required under the provisions of this act; and the board is authorized to institute and carry to a conclusion any and all legal proceedings which it may deem necessary for that purpose.

(b) The board shall gather, compile, compute, and publish from time to time data and information necessary and helpful to the performance of the duties of the board in the administration of this act, and shall make such investigations and publish the results thereof concerning employment conditions and relations between carriers and employees as shall be pertinent and helpful to the administration of this act.

(c) The board shall have the power and duty to make, publish, and enforce rules and regulations necessary for the efficient execution of the functions vested in the board.

(d) The board shall gather, compile, and publish such records as may be necessary to enable the board at all times to determine the respective rights, duties, and obligations of the carriers and their employees under the provisions of this act, and of any other persons affected thereby.

(e) It shall be the duty of the board to determine the amount of all contributions due or payments required under the provisions of this act, to keep public records of the same, to entertain applications from any and all persons directly interested in the enforcement of this act, to conduct hearings on such applications, and to settle controversies regarding such enforcement, and to make final decisions upon all issues of fact and to decide all other issues affecting the rights and obligations of any person under and by virtue of the provisions of this act, subject to the right of any person affected to obtain a judicial review (as hereinafter provided) of any action of the board, if otherwise any such person would be deprived of a constitutional right of judicial review.

(f) The board shall be empowered to examine the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the records of any carrier subject to this act which are subject to the examination of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to make such copies and such use thereof as may be necessary to aid the board in the execution of the functions vested in the board.

SERVICE RECORDS

SEC. 107. Within six months after the effective date of this act each carrier shall furnish to the board the service records of all its employees on the effective date of this act, whether actively engaged or furloughed (including the available records of officers and representatives of employee organizations, hereinbefore included within the definition of "employee"); and after the effective date of this act each carrier shall furnish to any employee leaving its service for any cause a service certificate showing the service of such employee, so far as it affects his rights or obligations under this act.

(a) Upon application by the board, or by the employee concerned, it shall be the duty of a carrier to furnish the board or the employee, as the case may be, with a certificate showing any past service of a former employee of such carrier when such an employee has been reported as an employee in active service, or as a furloughed employee, of another carrier on the effective date of this act.

(b) The board may require employees or carriers to furnish the ages of employees or any other information pertinent to the service, compensation, rights, or obligations of the employees or carriers under this act, which shall be found by the board to be necessary to the execution of the functions of the board.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF CARRIERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 108. For the purpose of providing the funds necessary for the payment of annuities and other disbursements required by this act, each employee shall contribute to funds, which are to be established and maintained as hereinafter provided, those percentages of his compensation received subsequent to the commencement date fixed in this act which are established in the schedule of standards, hereinafter set forth; and at the same time each carrier shall contribute to said funds a sum of money equal to each sum thus contributed by each employee. Each carrier shall deduct the amount of each employee contribution from the compensation due each employee at such intervals, and shall pay such contributions into said funds in such manner as the board may require, together with the corresponding and equivalent amount of the carrier contributions, concurrently due and payable. The aggregate amount of such carrier and employee contributions shall be charged by each carrier as a separate item of operating expense, and not included in any other item, and so accounted for in its reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(a) All contributions of carriers and employees to the funds established in this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the account of said funds and disbursed, in accordance with the provisions of this act, upon vouchers and warrants upon the order of the board, evidenced by the signature of the chairman. The Treasurer of the United States, as treasurer of said funds, is authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to invest and reinvest, so far as possible, all moneys in said funds not immediately required for disbursements, in the bonds, notes, or other obligations of the United States; and the interest on said investments shall be credited to the respective accounts of said funds. The treasurer shall make an annual report of the condition of said funds to the board and shall furnish such further information regarding the same from time to time as may be requested by the board.

SEC. 109. All expenses of the board and other expenses of the administration of this act shall be paid out of the fund hereinafter established and described as the "normal retirement insurance fund."

ELIGIBILITY, RETIREMENT, AND SERVICE

SEC. 110. (a) Only employees who have attained the age of 21 years and have been employed by one or more carriers for an aggregate of at least one year's service are subject to the provisions of this act. All requirements of this act shall be construed so as to exclude from consideration the first year of an employee's service and all service prior to the age of 21 years.

(b) No employee shall be eligible to receive an annuity or other beneficial payment under this act until one year after the effective date of this act.

(c) All employees shall be eligible for retirement upon attaining the age of 65 years, or upon the completion of 30 years' contributory service. Retirement at the age of 65 years shall be compulsory, with the following exceptions:

(1) No employee who has attained the age of 56 years or more on or before the effective date of this act shall be compelled to retire before he attains the age of 70 years;

(2) Any employee not within the foregoing exception who attains the compulsory retirement age of 65 years who desires and is able to continue his employment may be permitted on joint application of his employer-carrier and himself to defer his retirement for a period of not more than three years, if the board upon investigation shall find that such an extension of his service will be advantageous to the particular service in which he is engaged.

SEC. 111. Any employee who, after the effective date of this act, shall enter the service of any carrier after he has attained the age of 55 years, without having rendered any prior service to any carrier prior to attaining said age, shall not be subject to any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 112. Any employee who has attained the age of 69 years on or before the effective date of this act shall be retired one year thereafter upon an annuity paid out of the prior-service pension fund in the amount hereinafter fixed in section 204 of this act without any payment out of or obligation to contribute to the normal retirement insurance fund.

SEC. 113. The prior service period of any employee shall be computed by including as one month every calendar month (prior to the commencement date fixed in this act) during which he has been paid compensation by a carrier for service and for every 12 of such months the employee shall be credited with one year's service. In the computation of the total number of years of service of either prior service or contributory service, an ultimate fraction of less than six months shall be disregarded, but an ultimate fraction of six months' service or more shall be computed as one year.

SEC. 114. After the commencement date fixed in this act an employee shall have the option during a leave of absence or furlough not exceeding one year to continue his contributions on the basis of his annual compensation during his last preceding year of service (and to have said period of leave of absence or furlough included in his total service period and given appropriate weight in the ultimate computation of his average annual compensation). In the event that the employer-carrier has required or requested an employee to take such a leave of absence or furlough and the employee exercises his option to continue contributions, said carrier shall make corresponding contributions; but if said leave of absence or furlough is wholly voluntary, the employee shall be required to make both the carrier and employee contributions in order to have said period included in his total service period. Where a leave of absence or furlough exceeds one year no carrier contributions shall be required after one year, but an employee may continue to make provision for a retirement annuity and other beneficial payments under this act by paying both the carrier and employee contributions herein required on the basis heretofore set forth in this paragraph, in the same manner and with the same effect as though continuing in employment for the compensation earned during the year preceding his suspension of employment.

SEC. 115. The board is specifically authorized to make and enforce rules and regulations for computing the amount of service with which an employee shall be credited and the compensation of an employee upon which contributions shall be based, but all such rules and regulations shall have general application, and the specific applications and interpretations by the board of such rules and regulations in individual cases shall be final and binding upon carriers and employees.

SEC. 116. Wherever rates of pay, rules, and working conditions are determined by a contract, made in conformity with the requirements of the railway labor act between a carrier and its employees, the provisions of said contract and its interpretation or application as agreed to between the parties thereto, or as determined by any board of adjustment or arbitration established by the parties, shall be given full force and effect in any action taken by the board in the execution of its functions under this act to compute the service or compensation of an employee or to determine the contributions or disbursements to be made in accomplishing the objects and purposes of this act.

SEPARATION FROM SERVICE

SEC. 117. Any employee who shall become separated from the service of a carrier after the commencement date fixed herein and shall within one year after separation enter the service of another carrier shall have the same status in respect to the provisions of this act as if he had been engaged continuously in the service of one carrier, except that his period of nonservice shall be regarded as a voluntary leave of absence period in accordance with the provisions of section 110, paragraph (e) of this act, unless said employee shall after separation from the service of the first carrier exercise the option provided in paragraph (a) of this section.

(a) Any employee upon separation from the service of a carrier for any cause may exercise within a period of one year the option of terminating his accrued rights to any annuity, or other benefit, under this act by applying for a refund of all contributions made by him under this act with 3 per cent interest thereon computed annually. This refund with interest shall be paid to any such employee making application therefor as promptly as possible and shall constitute and be received as a full settlement of all obligations of every kind and character to such employee under and by virtue of the provisions of this act.

(b) If any employee shall become separated from the service of a carrier and fail to exercise his option to obtain a refund as provided in this section and shall not enter the service of another carrier within a period of one year, he may continue as a beneficiary of the funds to which he has contributed, either to the extent of his previous contributions and any previous equivalent contributions of a carrier or to the extent of said previous contributions plus any further contributions he may continue to make in the amount of his employee contribution plus an equivalent carrier contribution (both payable by said separated employee) on the basis of his compensation for the year of service last preceding his separation from service. If any such employee shall at any time default in paying the entire amount of these two contributions as and when directed by the board, his option to make any further contributions and to extend his beneficial interests under the provisions of this act shall at once cease, and his beneficial interests shall be determined on the basis of contributions made prior to such default.

DISABILITY

SEC. 118. Any employee who shall have served for not less than five years after the commencement date fixed herein and who, before becoming eligible for retirement, shall become totally and apparently permanently disabled for efficient service in the work previously performed by said employee by reason of any disease or injury not due to intentional self-injury of said employee (the burden of proof whereof shall be upon the employer) shall, upon the application of himself or the employer-carrier and due allowance of the claim by the board after investigation, be paid from the normal retirement insurance fund a monthly award equal to one-twelfth of 2 per cent of his total compensation during the entire period of his contributory service; but the total amount so paid shall not exceed twice the amount of his own contributions plus 3 per cent interest, computed annually, to the date of his disability. Such proof of such disability under this section shall be required as may be prescribed by the board, and continuous proof of such disability shall be required at least once each year in such manner and form as may be prescribed by the board, and if the beneficiary shall recover before reaching retirement age and become again qualified for efficient service fairly comparable in compensation to his service at the time of retirement, said disability awards shall be discontinued. The period of disability shall not be counted as service under this act and no contributions by employee or by employer-carrier shall be made during that period. Appropriate deduction for contributions repaid as disability awards shall be made in computing any retirement insurance to which a disabled employee may become eventually entitled.

DEATH BENEFIT

SEC. 119. Upon the death of any employee before or after retirement, the amount of his own contribution with 3 per cent interest thereon, less any amounts which may have been paid to him in annuities or for disability with 3 per cent interest thereon, shall be refunded to his legal representatives.

SEC. 120. An officer or representative of an employee organization who is not included within the definition of "employee" in section 101 of this act but who has rendered contributory service or prior service to one or more carriers may elect to continue as, or to become, a beneficiary under the provisions of this act by paying into the funds herein established the same employee contributions and the same carrier contributions which would be paid had such an officer or representative continued in the service of a carrier-employer on the basis of the compensation received for the last year of his service to a carrier.

ARTICLE II

SCHEDULE OF STANDARDS FOR THE BOARD

SEC. 201. Accounts: There shall be established an account for the normal retirement insurance fund, an account for the prior service pension fund, and such other accounts (which may include a surplus account) as the board may from time to time direct.

SEC. 202. Normal retirement insurance fund: All contributions to provide annuities, based on contributory service rendered after the commencement date fixed in this act, shall be credited to the normal retirement insurance fund, into which fund shall be paid, from the compensation of each employee in such manner as the board shall direct, a percentage of each employee's compensation according to the following schedule; payments being made in behalf of the employee, based on compensation earned during a calendar year of service, according to the age attained by the employee at the beginning of that year, as follows:

Attained age 34 or younger, 2 per cent.
Attained age 35 to 39, inclusive, 2½ per cent.
Attained age 40 to 44, inclusive, 3¼ per cent.
Attained age 45 to 49, inclusive, 4 per cent.
Attained age 50 and over, 5 per cent.

In the event, and whenever the board shall determine, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that a smaller or greater percentage is sufficient or necessary to provide for payment to each retired employee of a normal retirement annuity amounting to substantially 2 per cent of the average compensation of each employee for each year of contributory service multiplied by the number of years of such service, the foregoing percentages may be diminished or increased, as so determined by the board and approved by the commission. The foregoing provisions as to attained ages and percentages applicable thereto may be likewise modified.

Concurrently with each payment of the contributions of the employees (which are to be deducted by the carrier from said employees' compensation and paid over in such manner as the board shall direct) the carrier shall pay into the same fund an amount equal to the amount of the payment made of the employees' contributions.

SEC. 203. Prior service pension fund: In addition to each of the foregoing contributions to the normal retirement insurance fund and concurrently with each of said payments, the carrier and the employee shall each make a payment into the prior service pension fund amounting to 1½ per cent of the compensation of the employee, these additional contributions being made in order to provide a more adequate annuity upon retirement for those employees who have attained advanced years at the commencement date when payments into the normal retirement insurance fund begin.

SEC. 204. Annuities: Upon retirement, as hereinafter provided, each employee shall be entitled to be paid out of the normal retirement insurance fund an annuity equal to 2 per cent of his average annual compensation during his service subsequent to the commencement date fixed in this act, multiplied by the number of years of said service; and in addition shall be entitled to be paid out of the prior service pension fund an annuity equal to 1 per cent of his compensation for the first year after said commencement date, multiplied by the number of his years of service prior to said year: Provided, however, That such additional payment shall not exceed the amount necessary so that his total annuity from both accounts shall equal, if possible, but not exceed one-half of his compensation for said first year of service after the said commencement date. In the case of an employee who becomes eligible for an annuity with less than one year's service after said commencement date, his prior service pension payment shall be based on 1 per cent of his compensation during his last year of service preceding said commencement date.

SEC. 205. Whenever the board is of the opinion that within a period of 30 days the prior service pension fund may be found to be insufficient to meet the payments required from it, the board is authorized to transfer such sums of money from the normal retirement insurance fund as can be transferred without jeopardizing the ability of said fund to meet payments required from it; but all such sums so transferred shall be repaid to said normal retirement insurance fund before the said prior service pension fund is discontinued, as hereafter provided. It shall be the duty of the board to exercise its discretionary powers under section 104 of this act so as to protect the solvency of the normal retirement insurance fund and to provide an adequate and safe margin at all times between the contributions to and the disbursements from said fund. When eventually disbursements from the prior service pension fund shall cease to be required under the provisions of this act and all loans to said fund from the normal retirement insurance fund have been repaid, the board shall be authorized and it shall be its duty to give notice to all carriers and employees that further contributions to the prior service pension fund shall be discontinued as of a given date and as soon as possible thereafter the balance in said fund shall be transferred to the normal retirement insurance fund.

ARTICLE III

ANNUITANTS

SEC. 301. No annuity or other payment, nor any right thereto, under this act shall be assignable, either in law or equity, or subject to any tax, execution, levy, attachment, garnishment, or other legal process.

SEC. 302. No annuity or other payment to a beneficiary under this act shall be paid to any person who is not a citizen and resident of the United States, and if any annuitant shall establish his residence outside the United States, his right to further annuities shall thereupon cease, and, upon a finding to that effect by the board after due investigation, there shall be refunded to such a beneficiary the total amount of all contributions made by him, plus 3 per cent interest thereon compounded annually, minus the total amount of any payments of any kind under the act previously made to said beneficiary, which refund shall constitute a full settlement of all obligations to said beneficiary under this act.

ARTICLE IV

EXISTING RAILWAY PENSION SYSTEMS

SEC. 401. The board shall have the power to provide by appropriate rules and regulations for the substitution of the provisions for retirement annuities and other benefits to employees under this act for any existing provisions for the voluntary payment of pensions to employees subject to this act by carriers subject to this act in such a manner as to relieve such carriers of their obligations under such existing pension systems and to transfer such obligations to the funds herein established: Provided, That if the fulfillment of any such transferred obligation shall require additional contributions or larger payments than would otherwise be required under the provisions of this act, then the carrier originally responsible for the creation of such an obligation shall accept full responsibility for said additional contributions, or for the excess amount of such payments over those which would be required under the provisions of this act. In the event that the board is unable to make satisfactory arrangements with any carrier for the substitution of the provisions under this act for its existing pension system, then and in that event the provisions of this act shall be applied to said carrier and its employees without regard to any conflict or duplication in the operation of such an existing pension system and the operation and effect of the provisions of this act.

ARTICLE V

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 501. The several district courts of the United States and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to entertain an application and to grant appropriate relief in the following cases which may arise under the provisions of this act:

(a) An application by the board to compel an employee residing within the jurisdiction of said court, or a carrier subject to service of process within said jurisdiction, to comply with any obligation imposed on said employee or carrier under the provisions of this act.

(b) An application by an employee or carrier to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or to the district court of any district wherein the board maintains an office, or has otherwise designated an agent authorized to accept service in its behalf, to compel the board to set aside an action or decision claimed to be in violation of a legally enforceable right of the applicant, or to take an action, or to make a decision necessary for the enforcement of a legal right of the applicant, when the applicant shall establish his right to a judicial review upon the jurisdictional ground that, unless he is granted a judicial review of the action or decision, or failure of the board to act or to decide, of which he complains, he will be deprived of a constitutional right to obtain a judicial determination of his alleged right.

The jurisdiction herein specifically conferred upon the said Federal courts shall not be held exclusive of any jurisdiction otherwise possessed by said courts to entertain actions at law or suits in equity in aid of the enforcement of rights or obligations arising under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 502. Any employee or agent of a carrier or other person subject to this act who shall willfully fail or refuse to make any report or furnish any information required by the board in the administration of this act, or who shall willfully fail or refuse to make any accounting or payment required under this act, or who shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent statement or report required for the purpose of this act, or who shall knowingly make or aid in making any false or fraudulent statement or claim for the purpose of receiving any award or payment under this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

SEC. 503. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7912, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 40, line 4, after the word "regions," insert "and for encouraging of agriculture and the utilization of lands reclaimed in the South by drainage."

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WHEELER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8397) the Interior Department appropriation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 28, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

"For completion of public high school at Frazer, Mont., and for necessary equipment for manual, laboratory, and other lines of training, $15,000, to be immediately available."

On page 64, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following:

"CARE OF INDIGENT INDIANS

"For reimbursement to Cascade and Hill Counties, State of Montana, for hospitalization and subsistence for certain indigent ward and nonward Indians resident within such State, but not within any established reservation, $13,383.77, of which $6,726.16 shall be paid to Cascade County and $6,757.61 shall be paid to Hill County."

KIDNAPING OF THE LINDBERGH BABY

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a question to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, in the light of the ghastly tragedy that has befallen one of the most distinguished and beloved families in my State, the dastardly and cowardly kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby from its cradle last night, may I inquire of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska the status of Senate bill 1525, introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON], which bill very properly makes kidnaping a felony punishable either by death or imprisonment? I am sure the hearts of the people of the Nation, as well as of New Jersey, go out to this honored family in their hour of anguish, and I express the hope that this shocking occurrence will help expedite the immediate passage of this or any other measure that may tend to put an end to a crime which I, as a father myself, consider the most horrible of crimes and even worse than murder.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, I will state that the bill referred to was in due course referred to the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I understand from the clerk the subcommittee has reported it to the Judiciary Committee, and it is now on the calendar of that committee. I want to say to the Senator that, so far as I know, there has been no attempt on the part of anyone to delay the proper consideration of the bill. There is not any doubt but that within a very short time it will be taken up as soon as it is reached on the calendar by the full committee and disposed of.

Let me say to the Senator, while I have the floor, that the jurisdiction of Congress in a matter of this kind, of course, as he understands, is very much limited. I presume, under our Constitution, the Congress would be confined in its action regarding crimes of this kind to cases where the kidnaped person was taken across a State line, or something of that kind. It is, to a great extent, a matter within the province and jurisdiction of the various States, but, so far as the Government of the United States has jurisdiction, I think I am safe in assuring the Senator that the Judiciary Committee will give it as prompt and careful attention as it is possible to do.

Mr. BARBOUR. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey what are the provisions of the statute of New Jersey on the subject?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the Senator frankly that I am not very familiar with the statute; but I am having my office look it up now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Practically all States, if not all of them, have statutes penalizing kidnaping and most of them, according to my information, make it a very grave felony, heavily punishable by imprisonment.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BARKLEY BEFORE A JOINT SESSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF KENTUCKY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] before a joint session of the General Assembly of Kentucky on February 23, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and members of the general assembly, I am deeply grateful to you for the courtesy of the invitation which is responsible for my presence here to-day. While I have always been interested in the deliberations of the Kentucky Legislature, both as a citizen of the State and as a public officer, it so happens that only once in my life have I seen it in session, and that was so many years ago that it is barred by the statute of limitations.

Though I appreciated deeply the invitation to address you, when I received a copy of the joint resolution conveying it I hesitated to intrude myself into your midst by accepting it, because I am familiar with the very great problems with which you are dealing on behalf of the people of Kentucky, and I know how rapidly your allotted time is passing. But when I recalled that you had extended a similar courtesy to a large number of really distinguished citizens of the United States, I recognized that, though I was not entitled to claim membership in their class, I could not afford to admit it publicly. Under these circumstances, I felt like the young lawyer who was paying frequent and ardent attention to a young lady who had many other admirers. The girl's father, upon learning of his attentions, wrote to him as follows: "I am informed that you are paying constant attention to my daughter. I desire to see you next Monday night." Whereupon the young lawyer replied: "Dear Sir: Your circular letter received. I will be at the meeting."

We are in the midst of national and internationl circumstances which call for the most constructive thought, the most broad-minded treatment, the most intense and unselfish concentration of purpose of which the world of business, of politics, of national and international statecraft are capable.

It would be futile to attempt to assign or allocate all the causes which have produced our present difficulties, unless by recognizing them we can avoid them in the future.

It is an amusing sort of pastime to engage in disputes as to the relative degree of responsibility of politics, business, finance, government, and economics for the disaster which has overtaken the Nation and the world. I doubt whether any of them can establish a complete alibi.

In so far as our present situation may be traceable to the outbreak and extent and devastating intensity of the World War, certainly statecraft must accept the larger share of responsibility. Without here attempting to reiterate the threadbare controversy as to which group of the contending forces brought it about, I think no one would deny the charge that one or more governments, one or more rulers, one or more régimes, were primarily guilty of producing it or failing to prevent it. This responsibility, this guilt, this failure, therefore, lies largely in the field of politics and statecraft.

What has occurred since the close of the World War has been a mixture of politics and of business, a combination of the inaptitude of governments and the cupidity of business. It is not my task to apportion this responsibility.

But as a result of this combination we see the world prostrated. We see international business paralyzed, confidence gone, fear enthroned, millions of able and honest men idle and hungry and objects of public charity. We see the credit of many nations strained if not completely broken, budgets unbalanced, deficits mounting in both public and private treasuries, and institutions in which the people placed their confidence no longer able to perform the duties and functions for which they were organized; and we see men and organizations who a little while ago condemned and belittled all Government activities in the realm of business now crying out to the Government as the only agency of rescue left to them and to the people.

As was to have been expected, countless remedies, put forward by countless men, known and unknown, have chased one another through the mails, the magazines, and the newspapers, until almost a babel of tongues seems to have been reestablished and, in the language of Longfellow, "Things are not what they seem."

It is not my province to add mine to the confusing list. But if we are to escape similar catastrophes in the future, as well as dig ourselves from under this one which now besets us, we must look some facts in the face.

When the war came to a close, Great Britain found herself with a public debt of more than $40,000,000,000, a debt equal to about $1,000 for each inhabitant of the British Isles. This debt was not spread out over the colonies of England. It was solely the debt of the people of England, Scotland, and Wales.

Other nations of Europe found themselves loaded with equally staggering burdens until every sensible and observant person in the world realized the utter truthfulness of the old adage that, "Whoever wins a war loses it."

Our own debt was more than $26,000,000,000, an amount equal to one-tenth of our total wealth before the war; and in addition to her own internal debt, which she paid in a depreciated currency, Germany was assessed with an obligation of $32,000,000,000 as reparations on account of damages done during the war. Germany could not be imprisoned for "war guilt," so she was fined to the extent of $32,000,000,000, and now the whole world recognizes the serious question whether she can pay it, and those who were supposed to get it are intimating that we in America ought to pay it by canceling the debts which they owe us, under the theory that the one victorious nation which got nothing out of the war should continue to pay and pay and pay.

Yet we in our own country, by the erection of trade barriers which are indefensibly silly and short-sighted, have not only contributed to the mendicancy of other nations, but have well-nigh killed the famous goose that is supposed to furnish us with our own supply of golden eggs.

And yet, again, in spite of all that we saw and are supposed to have learned from that dreadful experience, the nations of the world, including our own, are finding it necessary or expedient to expend nearly twice as much in anticipation of another war that may come as they were expending in 1914 in anticipation of the war that did come.

And yet, again, in spite of the accumulation of these evils which are directly traceable to that war, we have large groups in our own country who are either afraid or unwilling to join any concert of nations, under any name or plan, to prevent a recurrence of such another world disaster, by judicial, calm, and peaceful settlement of international disputes.

What do we propose to do about it? We are told that the thing for us to do is to cancel all war debts everywhere, to wipe the slate clean and start all over again.

That is a very alluring prospect, of course, to the nations which owe the debts and which in large or small degree brought on the great conflict out of which they grew. But there is one thing which this international altruism can not lose sight of, and that is that we did not produce that war in America, and we were not remotely responsible for anything that did produce it. If the whole continent of Europe can be permitted so to maneuver its affairs over a long period of years as to make a World War inevitable because a demented student shoots an inconsequential archduke, and then load the burden of that war on the backs of innocent American taxpayers, then what incentive is there for them to go to the last ditch in preventing or avoiding another such debacle?

I am as generous of heart and as liberal of purse as my circumstances will permit, but I am not willing at this juncture of the world's affairs to see the whole burden of this European misadventure left on the backs of the American people, for you may cancel all international debts, if you will, but you can not cancel our own war debt, which represents in large degree money which we loaned to Europe, except by paying it. It would be infinitely wiser to reduce some of the artificial and blighting barriers to the flow of international trade and the resumption of international credit, so that the nations of the world can begin to make some money and pay their debts. In that way they can not only begin to meet their obligations but would at the same time, by avoiding the necessity for repudiation, enable them to save their self-respect.

But unless and until we can bring about a rational readjustment of international economics, what shall we do at home? We have problems enough here to engage the attention of most of us, problems which are appalling and are common to us all, problems which bedevil the town council and the State legislature no less than they bedevil the Congress of the United States.

I recognize the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of wholly separating our purely domestic problems from the combination of conditions and circumstances to which I have alluded. But there are some of them which we must deal with and solve, at least for the present, without regard to the degree to which world conditions have contributed to their existence.

One of these is that of taxation, and its handmaid, the increasing expense of operating local, State, and National Governments in this land of ours.

When the distinguished clerk of the house of representatives transmitted to me the invitation to address you he facetiously suggested that if I could tell you where to find $4,000,000 in additional revenue per annum for the operation of the State government, for God's sake come on down here and do it. My first impulse was to say in reply that I would gladly do it if he would come or send some one to Washington who could tell us where to find one and a half billion dollars of additional revenue per annum which the Secretary of the Treasury tells us will be needed to balance the Budget of our National Government.

This only serves to emphasize the universality of the difficulties under which all governments are resting and the difficulty of finding a satisfactory solution; and it is a strange—and to the average man a baffling—paradox that at a time when the people are least able to pay, the demand for increased taxes is greatest.

The enormous increase in the cost of government in this country is one of the most astounding and one of the most menacing facts in our history. This increase is not chargeable alone to the politicians. They have done their share to bring it about. But the people themselves are not to be acquitted altogether of a share in this responsibility. It has been the outgrowth of the demand of the people for improvement in their social, economic, and political welfare, and government in one form or another has been the agency most available and most serviceable in the promotion of enterprises which had at their roots the insatiable desire for a better civilization. These constantly increasing demands, which have been reflected in legislation calling for greater expenditures by the agencies of government over a period of a century and a half, have grown into an enormity which few stopped to measure until this greatest of all economic depressions came upon us almost without warning or notice, and now we are running around in circles trying to make income and expenses balance by reducing costs where we can and increasing taxes where we must. But the net result, I fear, will probably be a greater increase in taxes than a greater decrease in costs.

When in October, 1800, the Federal Government was moved from Philadelphia to the new Capital at Washington, a newspaper of the period recorded the fact that there were 54 Government employees involved in the move; that all documents and papers were brought to Washington in five small boxes and seven large boxes. To-day we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars in a building program in the National Capital to house the books and papers and records and the scores of thousands of employees now located in the various departments and bureaus.

Since that date our population has increased 2,300 per cent. We now have 10 major departments, 154 subsidiary bureaus, and 35 independent establishments in the Government at Washington.

In the year 1900 the expenditures of the Federal Government amounted to $650,000,000. To-day that amount barely pays the interest on our public debt, while the total annual expenses amount to more than $4,000,000,000.

In 1900 the amount contributed by each American citizen to support the Federal Government was $9.25. In 1932 that citizen contributes $40 to the expense of the National Government.

When at the beginning of this session of Congress we started out with some hope of being able to reduce these expenditures by something like $300,000,000 per annum, these hopes were soon dispelled when we were forced to take $500,000,000 with which to constitute the capital stock of a new Government corporation, created to afford credit to distressed financial, agricultural, industrial, and transportation organizations, which found elsewhere no facilities for obtaining credit, and $125,000,000 with which to infuse new circulating blood into the farm-loan system, which had been created and operated under the fostering care of the Federal Government. In addition to these great sums, which, combined, amount to a larger sum than the total expenses of the National Government prior to the World War, there is no way by which we can predict the extent to which the Government may be called on to administer the pulmometer to other enterprises or activities which may send up the S O S call for emergency relief.

But the Federal Government has not alone been the agency through which governmental expenses have mounted to staggering figures. State, county, and municipal governments have moved in the same direction, and largely on account of the increased demands of the people for exercise of the functions of government in the solution of their complex problems. The road-building programs, health conservation, the necessary injection of Government into the regulation and control of the activities of a complex age, the effort to keep unchoked the channels of trade and of industry, the enforcement of laws, and all the increasing manifestations of governmental power brought forth by the increasing demands of the people for its exercise have made inevitable the picture which it is so easy to draw and which in these distressing days is so unpleasant to have to unfold.

The grand total of expenses per annum in this country for expenses of government is more than $12,000,000,000, which for the year 1931 was more than one-sixth of our total national income.

To what extent this enormous sum may be decreased is not easy to estimate. It is not difficult to promise to reduce governmental expenses, but it is difficult to keep the promise. Every governmental agency, when established, soon acquires a very natural belief that it is indispensable and begins to marvel how the people were able so long to exist without it. When efforts are made to curtail or abolish it we are at once confronted with the reproach that we are contributing to the army of the unemployed by attempting to reduce or abolish Government positions.

In addition to this, there are certain fixed charges involved in every government which can not be eliminated without seriously crippling its functions and usefulness, as well as certain other moral obligations to the people which can not be abandoned without a degree of stultification. So that when it is all summed up only those who have to deal with the situation as executives or legislators know how ineffective are all our efforts to reduce expenses even in times like these in proportion to our reduction in income.

But if there is to be any relief of a permanent character to the people, if there is to be any new hope infused into the hearts of millions of our people in all the States and counties and cities of America, we must not be contented to do mere lip service to economy. We must inaugurate it at every point where it can be done without seriously interfering with the necessary functions of government, National, State, and local. We can not as public officers insist upon the compulsory exercise of rigid economy on the part of people and groups of people, while at the same time we continue to indulge in the unnecessary extravagances which all kinds of governments have acquired during the last decade and a half. Neither can we allow the financial affairs of our Government, whether State or National, to become so involved or precarious as to affect the credit of these governments in the eyes of the people. When the people lose faith in the integrity of our Government in its ability to meet its obligations, they will have lost faith in the only organized force under which they can seek or obtain protection either in peace or in war.

For this reason, therefore, while we may not and ought not to attempt, especially in the conduct of the National Government, to bridge the entire distance between income and expenses by harsh and unreasonable levies upon the private income of the people, or upon their property by increasing burdens that are already unbearable, or by contributing further to the bankruptcy of individuals or of industries, nevertheless we might as well recognize—and I believe the people are sufficiently intelligent and fair to recognize—that new sources of income and of taxation must be sought out in lieu of those which have been lost or exhausted in order that the institutions of our Government may maintain themselves for the adequate service of the people in every necessary activity.

My own belief is that it would be unfair, if not unwise, to attempt to raise by taxation the whole of a billion and a half dollars per annum by the National Government to try to pay at once the deficit which has been created by loss in revenues due to the depression. For more than 10 years we have been piling up surpluses in the Treasury each year, which have been applied to the premature payment of our war debt. There is nothing unwise or unbusinesslike in spreading the burden of attempting to balance our Budget over a period of years that will accomplish the same result and at the same time aid the people in the recovery for which we are all praying, but which has been predicted time and time again without sufficient advance information.

Another great problem which confronts the people of the Nation and of every community in it is that of unemployment. It is not a wholesome situation to realize that 8,000,000 able-bodied men, living in what has been boasted of as the richest Nation in history, find themselves, without any fault of their own, unable to obtain the necessary work to give their families the necessities of life. Considering the length of time during which this condition has obtained, we may regard ourselves as fortunate that there has been so much patience and long suffering on the part of those who have been the victims of that situation. And one of the faults which I find with some of those in high authority was their tardy willingness to recognize the facts as they were and their deliberate efforts to conceal from the American people what every man on the street already knew.

We have been considering in the National Capitol measures of various kinds to deal with and offer some relief for this situation. We are engaging in an academic debate over the primary responsibility of communities, States, or the Nation as a whole to attempt to afford relief to those in distress. Undoubtedly there is a primary obligation on the part of local communities and even of States to deal with this problem within their own borders. But we must not ignore the fact that the people, and especially those who are innocent victims of this crisis, draw no fine-spun or legalistic distinctions between the responsibility of local or national agencies of relief. While I believe in the primary responsibility of local agencies and local governments in dealing with problems that are local, I am not one of those who believe that a great nation, which is supported in peace by the taxation of the people and in war by the shedding of their blood, can afford to see its defenders or their dependents starve by sheer want and neglect while we engage in a sophomoric dispute over the question as to who should offer first aid.

While the question of unemployment is more acute at present than in ordinary times, we might as well recognize the fact that there will continue to be a certain and too large amount of permanent unemployment due largely to our growing technological causes.

We have made a god of mass production. We have boasted that we in America have given to the world 85 per cent of the inventions by which labor of the human hand has been eliminated to the extent that 1 man may now do the work of 50 men and at the same time produce a larger quantity of goods.

We have boasted of this and gloried in it on the theory that it was a great boon to the human family to be relieved of some of the burdens of manual toil. But we have, I fear, in our enthusiasm over the coming of the machine, overlooked some of the hardships which have come to those who were displaced by these modern methods. I do not wish to be understood as decrying or regretting the advance of machinery which has contributed so greatly to the enjoyment of living in the modern world in which we live. I recognize the futility of attempting to turn the clock back to an antiquated century. But if these changes in the methods of manufacture and of distribution of the necessities and the luxuries of life have been of sufficient benefit to society as a whole to justify their inauguration, then society as a whole owes it to those who have been and will be displaced to find a way by which they may maintain themselves and their families in self-respect and comfort as a part of that society upon which these benefits have been conferred.

In other words, if, as the result of our modern methods, a permanent condition has been established whereby all of the people may be employed three-fourths of the time, or three-fourths of the people employed all of the time, there is but one course, in my judgment, that can be pursued that does justice to all of our people. If there is not to be work enough for all of the people all of the time, then such work as remains to be done must be distributed among them so that each may have his share according to his ability and his opportunity. If this means the shortening of hours or of days, then society will have to adjust itself to such a new order. If it means the inauguration of the 5-day week or the 6-hour day in order that all of those who are willing to work may share in the toil upon which all must depend for their maintenance, then society must pay the price of its own advancement, for its own smug and complacent comfort. I do not mean to suggest or predict that government, as such, will necessarily be called upon to inaugurate such a change by compulsion; but industry, and finance, and politics, and religion, and sociology, and all the countless men and women who believe in justice and in equal opportunity for every man and woman living under the American flag, must give early consideration to this great problem which involves so large a proportion of the worthy and honorable men and women who form this great Nation.

The wise and farsighted adjustment of these troublesome questions that knock at our doors for solution can not be long deferred. Already we find a disposition in some quarters to take advantage of our present condition to inveigh against the stability, the wisdom, and the integrity of our political and our social institutions. Already we hear the threat of the iconoclast who would tear down the ancient landmarks of our national history. Already our ears are being deafened by the sound of destructive forces which would prey upon the misery of the people to make a holiday for their visionary passions.

That there have been and are great evils in our economic and political system no careful student can deny. That these evils must be eliminated, no man of vision or patriotism will contest. That we may be entering upon a new era of broader participation in the enjoyment of human blessings that should flow from democratic government, let us all fervently hope.

But we can not correct whatever evils may exist in our political, economic, or social life by destroying the foundations upon which our Nation has grown so great. We can inaugurate a more universal distribution of the benefits of modern civilization than have been thus far accomplished, but we can do it under the forms of democracy and under the direction of the popular will if that popular will is fostered and guided by the councils of wisdom of far-sightedness and of sacrifice.

It is not strange that we find among us the pessimistic and the doubting. It is not easy to explain, for instance, how or why it has been that in the United States of America more banks, State and National, have closed their doors than suffered a similar fate in all the civilized nations of the world combined. It is not easy to explain why in one year 2,345 American banks closed their doors, involving deposits of $2,000,000,000 of the people's savings, while our next-door neighbor, the Dominion of Canada, has not had a bank failure in nearly 10 years. It is not difficult to understand why in such circumstances great masses of the American people are beginning to wonder what is the matter with our banking system and whether some device can not be established by which they will be free from the fear which has resulted in the great amount of hoarding, of which such feverish complaint has recently been made; and especially when we contemplate that the great financial system set up in 1913 to protect us from such unprecedented conditions has been perverted from its original purposes and has been guilty of the same lack of confidence for which the people are being so severely criticized and condemned. I do not undertake here to offer offhand a solution for this pressing problem; but that a way out must be found if our financial institutions are to regain the confidence of the people and are to continue in the performance of the great function for which they were ordained, no sincere or earnest person can dispute. It is not difficult to understand why millions of our people complain at an economic condition which piles enormous surplus in field, factory, and warehouse, while they themselves go hungry and naked from inability to purchase them.

And we might as well also understand that these unprecedented and deplorable conditions can not be eliminated permanently by a mere extension of the facilities of credit. We can not borrow ourselves into prosperity. Since the beginning of this session of Congress in December, partisan politics has been largely adjourned. Men of all political faiths have sought to combine whatever wisdom they may possess in an unselfish effort to bring whatever relief, though temporary, can be afforded by legislation. We have placed at the disposal of American business, American agriculture, and American finance the credit of the Nation to a degree never before contemplated either by the founders or by the subsequent maintainers of constitutional government in the United States. We have done it in the hope largely that it might preserve the life of the patient until nature could take its course, or a major operation could be performed. But we need not deceive ourselves into the belief that this is a permanent cure for the disease from which we suffer. What the American people need is the restoration of their purchasing power. Many millions of them have already borrowed all the money they can borrow and much more than they can repay. It is small comfort to these millions to offer them facilities for increasing their indebtedness when they can not pay what they already owe. For this reason, while these temporary measures may serve to inject artificial stimulation into a very weak patient, they can not be regarded as a permanent cure for a chronic ailment.

What the American people need is not only the more rigid economy in the expenditure of public money but the elimination of all unnecessary extravagances and the lifting of the burden of oppressive taxation wherever possible. They need also a market for the products of their toil. That market will be increased at home when we have done something that lays the ax at the root of the evil by facilitating the resumption of trade at home and abroad. That market can be increased in the waiting, anxious nations of the world by a systematic reduction of the artificial and wicked trade barriers among all the nations of the world, and between this Nation and all of them, so that the flow of international credit and of commerce may revive the sinking hopes of men, both in high and humble station.

I have faith in the belief that out of our present confusion of tongues, a great voice will arise to speak the truth, and when it is spoken the people will hear it and follow it. I have faith in the permanence of the institutions of our country. They have brought us through 150 years of toil and sacrifice and advancement. They inspired us in our original revolution. They have struggled and lived through civil conflict, through disasters produced at the hand of nature, and through the folly of man. They have lifted us to a station in the affairs of mankind never realized by any other nation in all the history of humanity. They are worthy of our sacrifice when war comes either to our shores or to our institutions. They are worthy now of our patience, of our devotion, of our unselfish consecration in the hope and the firm belief that in the future, as in the past, they will emerge from the crucible of our present unhappy situation stronger, juster, more abiding in the hearts of the people of America than they have ever been before. It is my hope and belief that in the Nation and in every State and hamlet the same qualities which have led us to the heights of fame and achievement will command us not to retreat, or surrender the heritage which has been passed on to us by those whose names and deeds we hold as sacred; and that by our example and our singleness of purpose, without partisan rancor or factious indiscriminate condemnation, we may be instrumental in holding high in the heavens the banner of justice, of liberalism, and of progressive democracy.

MODIFICATION OF ANTITRUST LAWS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York American of February 25, 1932, and an editorial from the Boston News Bureau of February 23, 1932, favoring the passage of Senate bill 3256, which is designed to protect and foster trade and commerce and which was introduced by me several weeks ago.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York American, Thursday, February 25, 1932]

CONGRESS CAN AID BY LIFTING ANTITRUST STRAITJACKET

There is before the upper House a sensible measure proposed by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts to hearten honest business executives by modernization of the antitrust laws.

Known as Senate bill 3256, it has been properly described as a law "to protect and foster trade and commerce."

It would transform the Federal Government from a policeman wielding a nightstick over organized business into a civilized agency for guiding business along socially useful lines.

The fatuity of a mere negative attitude of curbing and discouraging business initiative has been fully demonstrated in recent months as more than 7,000,000 Americans have hopelessly trudged the streets without employment.

In 1890 there was a need to place restraint on greedy corporations. There still is in 1932.

Archaic antitrust laws instead make it a criminal offense for competitors to sit around a table to determine means of promoting cooperation, economic order, and consequent business prosperity.

Senator WALSH has suggested a way out, which conforms to the demand long made in the Hearst newspapers for rationalization of our antitrust laws.

The Senator from Massachusetts would leave the Sherman Act and the Clayton Acts, with their punitive clauses, on the statute books, but he would exempt from their jurisdiction certain business contracts when and if approved by the Federal Trade Commission.

In refusing to dissolve the United States Steel Corporation two decades ago the United States Supreme Court paved the way for Senator Walsh's amendment.

The high tribunal applied the famous "rule of reason" doctrine to the interpretation of the antitrust law. It gave a broad rather than a literal interpretation of the Sherman Act. Holding in effect that the Steel Corporation was a good trust, it refused to dissolve it because it had not restrained commerce "unreasonably."

But the court still left a wide twilight zone, which has paralyzed the initiative of business builders.

Senator WALSH would cease making a fetish of "restraint of trade" and would instead apply to business deals the commonsense test of whether or not they are in the public interest.

The essence of the Walsh amendment lies in these words: "If the commission (Federal Trade) is of the opinion that the contract is in the public interest, it shall issue and cause to be served on the petitioner an order approving the contract, or failing such opinion it shall issue and cause to be served on the petitioner an order disapproving the same. Without in any way limiting the power of the commission to determine whether the contract is or is not in the public interest, it shall be considered presumptive evidence that such contract is in the public interest if it results in a fair and reasonable compensation to producers of average ability and efficiency and to labor, and does not result in a selling price of the goods or commodities covered thereby in excess of a fair and reasonable price based on all fair and reasonable items of cost plus fair and reasonable profits, but the burden of proving that the contract is in the public interest shall be on the petitioner."

The public is protected against abuse of power by the regulatory commission, by a provision that all rulings shall be subject to review on petition by an aggrieved party in the circuit court of appeals.

The bill provides for the enlargement of the commission to a membership of nine. With the added duties, the personnel should consist of men of the highest integrity and discernment. Without an able personnel, the new formula can hardly succeed.

The bill opens the way for law and order in business in place of cut-throat competition and business anarchy.

It would stop antisocial wastage of natural resources.

It opens the gates wide for proper price fixing and beneficial merger agreements.

It would give business men wide opportunity to build a rational economic system, which could provide consumers with low prices and good service, and labor with high real wages.

It would help to end pauperization of millions of unemployed, because productive energy is misdirected.

It would help to end the anomaly of want and privation amidst plenty.

The powers that be in Washington should recognize that the business public does not consist of innocents who can be bamboozled by superficial antihoarding drives, but of intelligent men who will be heartened by genuine economic reform.

Passage of the Walsh bill would do its full share toward promoting business confidence and breaking the deadlock of paralyzing depression.

GUILDS' LESSON—MEDIEVAL THEORY OF TRADE REGULATION SERVICEABLE IN COMPETITIVE PRESENT—WALSH BILL HOLDS IDEA

By Thomas F. Woodlock

NEW YORK.—Last month Senator WALSH of Massachusetts introduced a bill "to protect and foster trade and commerce, to supplement the powers of the Federal Trade Commission, and for other purposes," the object being to "thaw out" the situation created by the antitrust laws. The heart of the bill is in section 46, which deals with contracts "to merge, consolidate, acquire stock ownership, fix prices, curtail production, apportion production, apportion sales, apportion territory, pool sales, pool profits, fix resale prices, of patented, copyrighted, or trade-marked or otherwise identified goods, or to do any act or acts which are prohibited or might be considered prohibited by the antitrust acts." All such contracts are to be submitted to the Federal Trade Commission, which shall open hearings upon them and after such hearings shall either approve or disapprove the contracts and such approval shall exempt them from the application of the antitrust statutes. A very important clause in section 46 (6) reads as follows:

"Without in any way limiting the power of the commission to determine whether the contract is or is not in the public interest, it shall be considered presumptive evidence that such contract is in the public interest if it results in a fair and reasonable compensation to producers of average ability and efficiency and to labor, and does not result in a selling price of the goods or commodities covered thereby in excess of a fair and reasonable price based on all fair and reasonable items of cost plus fair and reasonable profit, but the burden of proving that the contract is in the public interest shall be on the petitioner."

MEASURE ENVISAGES GUILD IDEA

Here we have clearly emergent the "just price" and the "just wage" of medieval days, with a strong suggestion of the medieval guild system—all perfectly good ethics and therefore perfectly good economics. And we have the regulative power removed from the courts acting post factum to a commission acting ante factum, which is the most obvious kind of common sense. Without accepting every detail of Senator WALSH's bill as sound and well adapted to the end in view, it can be said that it correctly envisages that end and takes the most direct road to that end. Further, it can be said of it that it is distinctly preferable to a bill which would amend either the Sherman Act or the Clayton Act—or so it seems to this writer. As a matter of fact, the Sherman Act's language needs no amendment but only an interpretation which shall give to the words "restraint of trade" their true meaning in the light of to-day's facts. So far as the Clayton Act is concerned, Senator WALSH's bill would take care of that.

Recognition of the destructive effects of unrestrained competition is one of the outstanding fruits and profits of the present world emergency, and it is earnestly to be hoped that we shall garner it for use. It is lawful for us, as the Latin poet had it, to learn from the enemy. Every heresy derives whatever vital power it possesses from the fragment of truth that underlies it, and the emphasis of the classical socialists upon the principle of cooperation is the secret of the vitality in the socialist weltanschauung.

Nature (to borrow that convenient phrase signifying the general "order of things") has forced the world into most intimate economic relations with cooperation as their fundamental principle, and we now find that she has no use at all for the principle upon which Adam Smith and his followers relied; i. e., free and unrestrained competition between individuals. The unfortunate thing is that while we see this to be true in the economic order, we are far from seeing that it holds true also in the political order. Nationalism in the latter is the equivalent or analogue of unlimited competition in the former and is fully as deadly in its consequences. Both will be, in fact, destructive of our system of civilization if allowed to run their course unchecked.

REGULATION ECONOMIC NECESSITY

"Regulation" of trade and commerce was a necessary part of the guild system and is a necessary part of any economic system which bases upon cooperation. The rules and practices of the guilds were very carefully drawn and were jealously watched by the courts of the day. It was, indeed, in guild days that regulation of "public utilities" originated, was accepted, and was practiced even before the law of contract took shape. As this writer tried to point out some time ago, the notion that "utilities" are "public" because they perform governmental functions is a purely modern invention without the slightest support in history, law, or common sense, presumably advanced to support the "prudent-investment" theory of value for rate making after a large advance in commodity prices. Nobody likes "regulation," but it is necessary for the reason that law is necessary, and we must make up our minds to accept it as a lesser evil than the evil of anarchic competition.

When, as, and if the world can achieve an end to the war and once again start something like normal trading, we shall have to consider very seriously legislation on much the same lines as those laid down in Senator WALSH's bill. If we could do it meantime, so much the better.

EVILS OF SHORT SELLING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New York World-Telegram of February 27, 1932, giving a report of an able address delivered by Mr. A. Vere Shaw, of Boston, Mass., a lecturer at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, upon the evils of short selling as now carried on on the New York Stock Exchange.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York World-Telegram, Saturday, February 27, 1932]

SHORT SELLING IS HELD ILLEGAL BY A. VERE SHAW—ECONOMIST DECLARES IT IS A DESTRUCTIVE, NONCREATIVE, GAMBLING DEVICE

Severe criticism of short selling as a destructive and noncreative gambling device was voiced last night in a Columbia network radio address by A. Vere Shaw, economist, investment counsel, financial writer, and a lecturer at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He is a member of the firm of Shaw, Kirkbride & Co.

From 1930 to 1931 the entire common capitalization of the J. I. Case Co. was sold ninety-four times, he said, and from 1906 to 1912 the entire common capitalization of the Reading Railroad was sold from twenty to forty times each year. These he cited as extreme examples of speculation, which is under scrutiny to-day.

Replying to Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, who recently defended short selling, Mr. Shaw said:

"Memberships in the stock exchange fluctuate in price, yet the stock exchange has never made it possible for short selling to be conducted in its own memberships. Why, then, should it insist that members of other business organizations be subjected to this 'officious' practice?"

Asserting that price is influenced by demand and supply, Mr. Shaw stressed that demand may be encouraged or discouraged and that supply may be interfered with, both rightfully and wrongfully, and that there are "wrongful ways of interference without resorting to the forging of stock certificates."

CASH, BUT NO STOCK

"The capitalization of a company is a matter of record," he said. "To issue securities beyond the amount authorized, or of a type not authorized, is a fraudulent and illegal act. Now comes the short seller, a stranger to the company and its stockholders, with cash but no stock, who puts on the market shares which do not exist.

"He thus expands the capitalization of the company without notice, without regulation, and unsuspected by buyers or the public. He thereby achieves a result which the corporation itself can not legally accomplish, but which it permits him to bring about when it lists its shares on the exchange. Is this not in the nature of a conspiracy between the corporation, the short seller, the lending shareholder, and the stock exchange which provides the facilities?

"We are told that this is not a sale of nonexistent shares but a sale for future delivery of shares that do exist. However, if there were a meeting of all those who consider themselves shareholders in this company, it would be found that more shares were represented than were in existence. While a known number of shares is outstanding, an additional unknown number has been sold short, and until these sales are covered there does exist a new and unauthorized class of nonvoting shares. This fictitious 'overcapitalization' represents the interest of short sellers, who have a negative influence on the welfare of the company."

STATISTICS OF BANK FAILURES

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a carefully prepared table of bank failures, showing the number of such failures for the 10 years prior to Mr. Mellon's incumbency of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and during the 10 years which he was Secretary of the Treasury, including January, 1932.

There being no objection, the table was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles on the subject of governmental expenditures, written by Arthur Sears Henning and published in the Chicago Tribune, Mr. Henning being the able correspondent of that newspaper in this city.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Indiana. He has just asked, as I understand, to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. WATSON. No. I asked to have printed in the RECORD two articles written by Arthur Sears Henning, correspondent of the Chicago Tribune in this city, and published in that newspaper, on the subject of governmental expenditures.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUREAUCRACY IS DUG IN DEEP AND HOLDS ON TIGHT—ONLY PUBLIC REVOLT CAN UPROOT IT

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 27.—After half a century of intensive development, paternalism is so deeply intrenched in the Federal Government that it will take a political revolution to uproot it.

The farmers resist any curtailment of the vast machinery for promotion of the interest of agriculture at the expense of the public Treasury built up since the Civil War. Business men would economize almost everywhere save in the services furnished them by the Department of Commerce, which, enormously expanded when headed by Mr. Hoover, is about to move into a Greek temple covering three city squares. Labor is up in arms at any suggestion of retrenchment in the Department of Labor, which was created just before the World War.

PUT EXPENSE ON THE TAXPAYER

Few of these services would have been established in the first place if the expense of their maintenance had been assessed in the form of fees upon the ostensibly benefiting interests. In nearly every case the cost was assessed upon the entire body of taxpayers. The motive underlying the creation of each service to particular interests was that of getting something for nothing.

In many cases no actual service has been rendered, the bureaus involved taking credit for natural development.

The Federal bureaucracy which fattens on paternalism is composed of more than 700,000 persons, through whom approximately 3,000,000 people subsist, upon the Government's civil pay roll. This octopus reaches a myriad of tentacles into both Houses of Congress and into both major political parties, compassing a strangle hold on legislation and appropriation.

FEAR TO VOICE OBJECTIONS

Thousands of the most influential persons in private life are fully aware of the waste of public money on paternalism, on subsidies to agriculture, industry, and labor, and on functions regulatory of the public activities and private morals of the individual, but refuse to speak out from fear of the vengeance of the bureaucracy.

"Everything you have said about the enormous waste of tax money in extravagant expenditures and in activities beyond the scope of the original conception of the Federal Government is true," said a millionaire manufacturer, who proceeded to cite numerous instances of his own observation. "But don't quote me. I sell a lot of equipment to the Post Office Department and I can't afford to lose the business."

Revolt is brewing, however, in the ranks of industry and commerce against hampering Government regulation. Merle Thorpe, editor of the Nation's Business, who has made a study of paternalism and the Federal bureaucracy, asserts that business is no longer independent. I asked him to outline the results of his investigation.

LOSES FREEDOM OF ACTION

"One of the factors of the present situation, generally overlooked, is that business has had its freedom of action whittled away," he said. "To-day it is no longer independent. It can not move without jostling the tax gatherer, the commissioner, the supervisor, the inspector, the examiner, and other public agents. It constantly trips over rules and regulations of bureaucratic origin and is continually entangled in miles of official red tape.

"Politics has seductively but none the less effectively hamstrung the manufacturer, the distributor, the merchandiser, the transportation man, the banker, the insurance man, the oil, coal, and timber producers, and the farmer.

"This hamstringing has been brought about not only by the 1,900,000 laws we have put on the statute books but by allowing boards and bureaus and commissions to build up multitudinous and multifarious regulations which have all the effect of law.

"The second obstacle is the regulatory features of government. Every business man and practically every professional man is now directly or indirectly subject to regulations; springing from Congress, State legislatures, city and county councils, and administered by an army of bureaucrats.

"Consider the plight of the railroads to-day. One of our first experiments in regulation was designed to correct unfair practices on the part of a few railroad managers. The course of that experiment is typical of all governmental activities. It started on a small scale. But we have added crust upon crust to the original purpose of the Interstate Commerce Commission until railroad management to-day is circumscribed by a wall of prohibitions.

"It can not fix the price of the only thing the railroads have to sell, which is transportation. It can not issue stocks or bonds without approval of the Government. The Government tells the railroad what safety appliances it must install. It fixes the hours of service of employees.

"Railroad management can not build a new line without permission. It can not extend an old line without permission. It can not abandon a line without permission, even if it shows, as in one case, that the passenger traffic does not pay the engineer's salary. It can not acquire other railroads without permission. Nor can railroads determine the rate of wages to be paid their employees.

CAN NOT KEEP THEIR PROFITS

"At the same time the Government may order railroads to add to their equipment or extend their lines. The Government fixes the value and the enormous expense of the valuation has been not only a tax upon the railroads but upon the taxpayers. The railroads must keep their accounts as the commission prescribes. The railroads can not keep their profits in good years if they exceed 6 per cent. And they are not, as is stated over and over again by politicians, guaranteed any income whatsoever. They are allowed to earn so much—which is quite a different thing.

"As a matter of fact, railroad management rests in a Government bureau; different from private management because, while it has the power, it does not share the responsibility."

The expense of this kind of secondary government management is not reflected alone in public pay rolls, Mr. Thorpe pointed out. While the Interstate Commerce Commission employs 2,000 persons the practitioners registered at the commission in 1930 numbered 4,351. These are paid by the railroads and the public and probably the expense is many times greater than the actual expense of the commission.

GOVERNMENT BY SUGGESTION

"The third obstacle which curtails the freedom of the business man in the United States—a country which enjoys the position of the greatest economic Commonwealth—is supervision," Mr. Thorpe continued. "It is a milder form of regulation, but none the less deadly and deterrent. Supervision suggests and the suggestion takes on more and more of governmental order. It reached its fine bloom recently when field men of the Government were threatening retailers who would not fill out questionnaires on chain stores.

"Closely akin to supervision is 'servicing.' By oral and ocular advice citizens are told what crops to raise, how to raise them, and how with the helping hand of Government to market them. The Federal Government in Washington will tell you how to build a henhouse and how to train grocery clerks, how to hang curtains in the home, how to pack a schoolboy's lunch, how to predict the price of hogs by logarithms, how to prescribe castor oil for the baby.

SEVENTY MILLION PAMPHLETS

"The Government deluges the country with more than 70,000,000 copies of pamphlets a year, many of them containing self-helps which recalls Macaulay's outburst: 'Nothing is so galling to a people not broken in from birth as a paternal or, in other words, a meddlesome government, a government which tells them what to read and say and eat and drink and wear.'

"It may be that we have embarked so far on this road to paternalism that there can be no turning back. The plight of Australia, now bankrupt because of paternalistic schemes, the recent cataclysm in England and in Germany, both brought about by the same insidious growth, seem to offer no restraint to those who would plunge government into more and more social schemes involving our economic welfare."

[From the Chicago Tribune of December 30, 1931]

UNITED STATES PRINT SHOP AN EXAMPLE OF BUREAU WASTE—AND IT COSTS TAXPAYERS MILLIONS

By Arthur Sears Henning

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29.—The Government Printing Office provides an excellent bird's-eye view of the present extent of the paternalism which is costing the American taxpayers approximately $2,000,000,000 annually that measures the differences between Uncle Sam's income and outgo this fiscal year.

The establishment of the Public Printer, with his 5,000 employees and $3,000,000 appropriation, is the headquarters of the greatest correspondence school on earth. More than 200,000,000 copies of publications, costing $10,000,000 for printing alone, issue annually from the Government printing presses, furnishing information and instruction on more than 10,000 different subjects.

THEY REGULATE EVERYTHING

In the constantly expanding range of subjects dealt with in these publications, there is graphically exposed the results of the urge to bring all human habit and activity under the regulation and care of the central government.

Here are monographs on the noble experiment of denying the individual the right to drink alcoholic beverages which accounts for nearly one-half of the amount that Uncle Sam's ledger is in the red. Here are myriads of pamphlets manifesting the solicitude of the Federal Government for the welfare of the citizen from the cradle to the grave.

More than 100,000 scientists and other kinds of experts conduct the experiments, researches, and studies that go into the Government publications, nearly all of which are distributed free of charge. They advise the expectant mother. They tell you how to take care of a baby. They instruct the farmer in the growing and marketing of his products and his wife in cooking, sewing, and furnishing the home.

NO TOPIC TOO TRIVIAL

They tell you how to keep well and how to get well when you are sick. They furnish you dress patterns. They quench your thirst for knowledge of the life history of bed bugs and tell you how and how often to change the bed sheets. They tell you how to make a flytrap. If your taste runs to delicacies you can learn from Uncle Sam how to prepare caviar for the table and if you are aweary, you can take it from your Government that "a folding chaise longue is the last word in relaxation."

If you are thinking of taking up betel-nut chewing you can learn all about it from a Government publication. Other monographs instruct you on the digestibility of tepary beans, on saving babies in Buenos Aires, on "métodos oficiales para reducir la mortalidad infantil," on pumping from wells for irrigation, on the anatomy of the railroad worms, on the proper method to brush your teeth, on expert shoe polishing, on the art of brick laying, on breast feeding, on the character of paleozoic rocks encountered in a well near Florence, Ala., on dietetic discoveries at Miss Farmer's school of cookery, on the malleability and metallography of nickel, on the nature of language, on the "elimination and toxicity of caffein in nephrectomized rabbits," and on thousands of other matters mentioned in thousands of pages of the catalog of Government publications.

SHIPPED OUT BY THE TON

Books and pamphlets prepared and published and distributed by mail at Government expense are shipped out of Washington by the ton every day. They are a leading stock in trade of the Senator or Congressman seeking to ingratiate himself with his constituents. The free-seed graft was abolished but the free-publication graft flourishes as the green bay tree.

"The United States is the greatest of all publishers," says the Superintendent of Documents. "It employs thousands of scientists, who are engaged the year round making investigations in all branches of agriculture and household economy, in geology, in mining, in electricity, in chemistry, in astronomy, in engineering, in aviation, in preventive medicine, in forestry, in irrigation, in shipping and railroad problems, in trade and manufacture.

"The results of all these activities of the most comprehensive and effective organization ever known are constantly reduced to print and poured out in an incessant flood from the Government Printing Office, at Washington, the largest printing plant in the world."

BOASTS ON INCREASED PRODUCTION

The Public Printer, in his last annual report, boasts of the increased production of his plant, not mentioning the increased cost to the taxpayers. He tells of a total of 3,903,932,177 copies of all printed matter turned out during the year, an increase of 501,800,591 copies over the previous year.

"The tremendous growth in the work of the Government Printing Office during the 10 years, 1921–1930," he says, "is shown by the increase of 39 per cent in the computed value of its products, which totaled $117,256,250.97 for the 10 years, 1921–1930, as compared with $84,262,580.79 for the 10 years, 1911–1920."

The printing and binding done for Congress cost $2,499,510 in 1930, and "almost exhausted the annual working capital of the Government Printing Office available for that purpose," says the Public Printer. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which cost $758,693, an increase of $178,404 over the preceding year, has a circulation of 36,000 copies, of which 520 represent paid subscriptions. Each Senator receives 88, each Representative 60 copies for free distribution.

There were 8,859,918 copies of bills printed. The printing of testimony at committee hearings held on these bills cost $349,601.

FOR CONGRESSMEN'S FRIENDS

The speeches of Senators and Representatives printed in pamphlet form for franking to constituents number 16,843,850 copies, costing $67,368. There were 15,157,200 copies of farmers' bulletins mailed chiefly by Members of Congress which were turned out at a publication cost of $206,919. The Agricultural Year Book, another favorite item in the rural Member's bag of tricks, was issued in 400,576 cloth-bound copies at a cost of $281,879.

Then there was the 354-page memorial volume "suitably bound in blue cloth with a special hand-lettered cover design" and entitled "The list of mothers and widows of American soldiers, sailors, and marines entitled to make a pilgrimage to the war cemeteries in Europe."

The Government Printing Office is now engaged in turning out a monumental 25-volume edition of the writings of George Washington for which Congress has appropriated $157,975.

FEDERAL AID TO STATES IN FORESTATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask be read, and request the attention of the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

The resolution (S. Res. 175) was read, as follows:

Whereas the consumption of the forests of the United States has progressed to a point at which their early exhaustion is threatened, it being estimated (1) that over 50 per cent of all the softwood lumber cut in the United States has been cut during the last 30 years; (2) that with a population almost 60 per cent greater to-day than at the beginning of the twentieth century, the United States has been using nearly 300,000,000,000 feet of softwood lumber alone during each decade since 1900; (3) that in 1928, with a population of more than 120,000,000, the annual cut of softwood lumber alone was 28,000,000,000 feet; and (4) that there now remain in the territory east of the prairies only about 25,000,000,000 feet of original timber; and

Whereas there are great areas in the United States which, aside from their underlying minerals, are suitable for forestation only, it being estimated that of the great land area constituting the 13 Northeastern States, from Maine to and including the two Virginias, about one-half, or 75,000,000 acres, are suitable for forestation only; and

Whereas proper utilization of such lands as a public domain, under proper control, would to some extent effect a modification of the climate, substantially affect or control the run-off of water, supply a cheap and dependable supply of lumber, and, through development, with roads, camping places, leased hunting and fishing rights, and other opportunities for social activities, would afford valuable resources for entertainment and improvement in national health, besides giving wealth-producing and steady employment to a large number of persons; and

Whereas it is desirable (1) that a coordinated plan be immediately developed for the cooperation of the Federal and State Governments in the utilization of such lands suitable for forestation only, (2) that information necessary as a basis of legislation be compiled, and (3) that recommendations for legislation be made: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is requested (1) to advise the Senate as soon as practicable whether, in his opinion, the Government should undertake to aid the States in the utilization for forestation purposes of those areas of land in the United States suitable for forestation only, and (2) to state fully his reasons for any opinion which he may submit, together with the facts upon which such opinion is based.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this resolution involves a matter simply of information from the Secretary of Agriculture; and I ask unanimous consent that it may be placed upon its immediate passage.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the purposes of the resolution may be very commendable but the matter is an important one, and I think it should go over for the day.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed.

DEPRECIATION OF FOREIGN-CURRENCY VALUES

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 168, Senate Resolution 156, to investigate the effect of the depreciation of foreign-currency values upon importations of important commodities into the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. McNARY addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED. I may say, in making that motion, that if the motion is agreed to, it will be my intention immediately to ask that the consideration of the resolution be set aside temporarily, and that we proceed with the conference report on the constitutional amendment; and subsequently——

Mr. McNARY. That does not go far enough to suit the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. REED. And subsequently, I was going to say, to set it aside for the consideration of the two appropriation bills now on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the calendar number, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. REED. No. 168.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a number of Members of the Senate have requested the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar; and I should expect the resolution to be set aside for that purpose immediately following action on the request of the Senator, if it is granted.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to make that request, also.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senate should proceed, at this stage of affairs, to the consideration of this resolution. The matter is a controversial one. If the calendar is to be considered, I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he let the resolution go over for the present.

Mr. REED. I should like to have it made the unfinished business, and then, when these emergent matters are disposed of, to have it taken up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator intends to insist upon his motion?

Mr. REED. I shall have to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Austin	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Bankhead	Davis	King	Smith
Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Smoot
Barkley	Dill	Lewis	Steiwer
Bingham	Fess	Logan	Stephens
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bratton	Glass	Morrison	Trammell
Brookhart	Glenn	Moses	Tydings
Broussard	Goldsborough	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Gore	Norbeck	Wagner
Bulow	Hale	Norris	Walcott
Byrnes	Harrison	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hatfield	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hayden	Patterson	Waterman
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White
Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Couzens	Kean	Schall

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 156, to investigate the effect of the depreciation of foreign-currency values upon importations of important commodities into the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. ASHURST, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement, not exceeding five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate has an unofficial committee which assumes to formulate programs of procedure. I refer to the committee of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is chairman. It is not a standing committee of the Senate, but it performs a function that on many occasions has proved helpful in preventing conflicts in the Senate to determine what measures shall have precedence.

After due consideration of a number of measures, the committee referred to formulated a partial and tentative program, and issued and published a statement, delivering copies of it to all Senators. That statement is dated February 29; and it gives, or seeks to give, precedence in the following order:

The anti-injunction bill.

The tariff bill.

And the resolution which the Senator from Pennsylvania seeks to have considered out of the order arranged and agreed upon by the informal committee to which I have referred.

I recognize the fact that the Senate has absolute control over its procedure and can ignore arrangements of the character described when entered into, but usually, before overriding or disregarding such tentative arrangements, notice is given or complaint is made. Now, when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], pursuant to a quasi-agreement, was about to ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar, which is the regular order, the Senator from Pennsylvania, without notice, undertakes to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of his resolution out of the order prescribed by the committee.

Without attempting to debate the merits of the resolution, or, for that matter, the merits of the decision reached by the committee, I am going to ask the Senate to adhere in this instance to the action and recommendation of the committee.

I think it will be a mistake not to do that. If we are to be served with notice by leaders from the other side, who apparently are dissatisfied with the action of the committee that seeks to make a harmonious arrangement regarding precedence in the consideration of bills, that that arrangement is to be disregarded whenever it does not suit an individual Senator, and if the arrangement is to be overridden in the way this is attempted to be done, the committee referred to will become utterly useless and helpless. It is not fair to the committee, if we are to recognize the committee at all. There is no intention to prevent consideration of the Senator's resolution in due course.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. I think I have concluded all I have to say.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I shall have to speak in the Senator's time; otherwise I am out of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I rose simply to concur in the observations submitted by the Senator, and to say that this thoroughly nebulous committee realizes the limitations upon its authority; and in the effort harmonize a program it is undertaking constantly to keep itself in consultation with the leadership upon the other side of the aisle, and to agree, so far as possible, upon a program to which we can adhere for the sake of the expedition of business. The Senator from Arkansas has correctly stated that the program as printed is the agreement as indicated.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question in the time of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if it is not true that some of us on this side intended to bring up the so-called tariff bill which passed the House sometime ago even before the anti-injunction legislation was taken up, but we refrained from doing so on the arrangement that this tariff bill was to follow the anti-injunction bill, and then the exchange resolution was put on by the committee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And we abided by that understanding.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did consult the Senator from Michigan about getting up this resolution. I understood from him that it was satisfactory that it should be brought up immediately after the anti-injunction bill was disposed of. I was surprised to find on reading the printed list presented by the steering committee that somebody, without consulting with me—and, of course, he was not bound to consult with me—had inverted the order and had put the tariff bill first, followed by the resolution embodying a request to the Tariff Commission for information. In other words, this nebulous committee, about which the Senator speaks, proposes that we shall act on the tariff first and get the information about the tariff after we shall have acted on it.

I did not suppose for one moment that that could have been a deliberate intention of so logical a person as my friend from Michigan. If he insists that that is his intention, if he insists that we shall first legislate upon the tariff, and having legislated upon it we shall then seek information to enable him and us to legislate, of course, in his position as chairman of the steering committee, he will doubtless muster enough votes on this side, in addition to our Democratic friends, who do not want the truth brought out either before or after.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I would not say that, if I were the Senator from Pennsylvania. We are all seeking the truth.

Mr. REED. I am sure of that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And the Senator surely would not attribute to me a motive to object to the truth.

Mr. REED. No; I would not, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If I object to the Senator's resolution, it is because I think it may get us farther away from the truth.

Mr. REED. Perhaps that is the motive of all of the Senators on the other side. I notice, however, that when the resolution once before passed the Senate it was then reconsidered on motion of one of our Democratic friends.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think I made the motion.

Mr. REED. I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] made the motion. The desire for truth undoubtedly exists on the other side of the aisle; but Senators over there want their truth taken discreetly, like other dangerous things, and I think they would prefer to have it after Congress has acted on the tariff bill and after the Congress has adjourned.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I hardly think I ought to ask the Senator to yield for the observation I am about to make, but I believe he will do so.

Mr. REED. Of course I will.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is very surprising to find the Senator from Pennsylvania embarking on such an unusual and astonishing enterprise as a search for the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, and it is very disheartening, when one is reforming and starting out to search for the truth, as I am doing, to meet with so many checks and to be constantly rebuffed, to have one's resolution first passed and then reconsidered, and then objected to every time it is reached on the calendar. Really, I can not think of any other way of getting the resolution before the Senate, Mr. President, than moving to take it up, a crime which has been committed in the past by many of us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to assure the Senator that no matter whether I agreed with what the Senator was trying to do or not, under ordinary circumstances I would be in favor of taking his resolution up. But the Senator has not proceeded in the ordinary way. I presume the clerk would have been calling the calendar within a short time, and if this resolution had been objected to when it was reached on the calendar, then, under the rules, the Senator would have had the right to make a motion to take it up anyway. But he has made his motion now, which of course is in order, but under the rules there can be no debate about it, and it seems to me it is a procedure which is very seldom resorted to. I would feel inclined to vote against the motion now that there is opposition to it, especially after I have heard what the Senator from Michigan has said. My inclination would have been to vote the other way.

Mr. COUZENS. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's three minutes are not up yet.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes; they are.

Mr. REED. I fancy my three minutes are up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a debatable question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MCNARY. On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY]. I understand that that Senator would vote on this question as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. HEBERT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Not knowing how he would vote, in his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are necessarily absent. If present, those Senators would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—12

Barbour	Frazier	Patterson	Smoot
Bingham	Metcalf	Reed	Walcott
Davis	Moses	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman

NAYS—68

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barkley	Dickinson	Keyes	Smith
Black	Dill	King	Steiwer
Blaine	Fess	La Follette	Stephens

NOT VOTING—16

Bailey	Harris	Hull	Pittman
Borah	Hastings	Jones	Shortridge
Caraway	Hawes	Long	Swanson
Connally	Hebert	McKellar	Townsend

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution No. 156.

PROPOSED BANKING LEGISLATION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]?

The Committee on Banking and Currency for a year or more have been engaged very diligently in examining the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia with respect to what, if any, improvements may be made in the banking law and cognate questions. They have taken a large amount of testimony. I have been advised, or I thought I had been advised, that a bill was ready to be reported. I should like to ask the Senator when the bill will be reported to the Senate, and what is the reason for the delay, in view of the long time it has been before the committee, and in view of the fact that other measures introduced at later dates seem to have been accorded preference?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that one reason for the delay was the request that two certain provisions of the bill be taken out and put into an emergency measure known as the Glass-Steagall bill, with a view to the immediate relief of a very distressing situation. That was done, as the Senator knows, and we are now prepared to go ahead with the permanent legislation which we have in mind. The bill has been reported by the subcommittee to the general Committee on Banking and Currency. It has been made a continuing order. The subcommittee hopes within a few days at most to resume the consideration of the bill before the general committee.

Mr. KING. May I say that the Senator from Virginia, I know, has been diligent in the matter. He challenged attention a few days ago to the fact that some banking organizations in the United States seem to be hostile to the bill and undoubtedly—and I draw this inference from statements made by various persons as well as by the press—were doing all they could to defeat it. I was wondering whether the pressure was so great as to delay the reporting of the bill and whether an attempt is being made now by an investigation of stock sales to becloud the atmosphere so as further to delay consideration of the very important measure which the Senator has done so much in formulating.

Mr. GLASS. The statement made as to the attempt of certain banking interests to interfere with the consideration of the bill was entirely accurate. That attempt persists and will persist until the bill shall have been considered by both branches of Congress. It will be pursued into conference, as is the case with all important bank bills which are thus pursued by interested people. Those speaking for certain banks have undertaken to interfere with the progress of the bill, but I think I may assure the Senate that those who have the bill in charge are not to be deterred or delayed by selfish interests.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator for the information.

FIXING TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, AND CONGRESS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on Senate Joint Resolution 14, fixing the terms of President and Vice President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following conference report submitted by Mr. NORRIS on Monday last:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"'ARTICLE —

"'SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"'SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"'SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"'SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"'SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.'"

And the House agree to the same.

G. W. NORRIS,
WM. E. BORAH,
THOS. J. WALSH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LAMAR JEFFERS,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
CHAS. L. GIFFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily. I have an idea that most Senators understand what changes the conferees have made in the joint resolution as it passed the Senate.

I will state briefly that section 1 of the proposed amendment to the Constitution as it now appears in the conference report is identical with section 1 as the joint resolution originally passed the Senate, except as to a change in date. The conference report changes the date from the 2d of January to the 3d of January and changes the other date from the 15th day of January to the 20th day of January. With those exceptions, there is no change whatever in section 1.

Senators all realize that section 1 is really the crux of the entire amendment. It is the section that changes the date for the beginning and ending of the terms of President, Vice President, Members of the House, and Members of the Senate, and obviates and does away with what is now known as the short session of Congress. As we have agreed upon it, it provides for the meeting of Congress on the 3d day of January after the November election instead of the 2d day of January as the joint resolution passed the Senate.

Section 2 of the conference report is identical with section 2 of the joint resolution as it passed the Senate with the exception of changing the date from the 2d day of January to the 3d day of January. That is the date for the convening of Congress. As it passed the Senate it provided for the convening of Congress on the 2d day of January, but as agreed to in conference the date is changed to the 3d day of January.

Section 3 in substance is the same as it passed the Senate, though several changes have been made by the conferees in the language.

Section 4 of the joint resolution as it passed the Senate is now section 5 and is exactly the same as it passed the Senate except that it applies only now to sections 1 and 2 of the amendment. As it passed the Senate it read:

SEC. 4. The amendment shall take effect on the 15th day of October after its ratification.

As agreed to in conference it now reads:

SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

That leaves the balance of the section to go into effect as soon as it is ratified.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator what date is provided for the convening of Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. The 3d day of January.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the present law provide for the convening of Congress on the first Monday in December?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMITH. To obviate the question of convening on Sunday, might it not be well to provide a certain day instead of a certain date?

Mr. NORRIS. The conference committee and members of the Judiciary Committee in the consideration of other resolutions which we have passed on before relating to the subject, have given considerable attention to that question. The law provides that the terms of Senators shall be for six years and that the terms of Members of the House shall be for two years. There might possibly come a conflict if we undertake to make the term commence and end on a certain day of the week instead of a certain date. It might make the term a little more than two years, in the case of Members of the House, or a little less than two years. There might be as much as six days' difference.

When we come to think about it, it might happen and will happen occasionally that we will meet on Sunday, but that would be about the same as the arrangement we have now when we close a session on Sunday. If the 4th of March comes on Sunday, nobody thinks of having a session of Congress on Sunday up until noon on that day. That will not occur hereafter. It may happen that the beginning instead of the end of the session will fall on Sunday, but there will be no more Sunday work than there ever has been.

Mr. SMITH. The time of convening has been made contemporaneous with the beginning of one term?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing that can be done about it now because the conference report is here, but what was the real objection to having the Congress assemble and the beginning of the terms occur on the first Monday in January?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether the Senator was here a moment ago when I explained that. I have just stated that if we had it begin on the first Monday in January we would have at least a technical conflict with other provisions of the Constitution which provide that the term of a Member of the Senate shall be six years and of a Member of the House two years. If we had those terms commence on Monday and end on Monday, it might be that they would be six days more than two years or six days less than two years, or at least there might be several days' difference. As I said, the 4th of March is liable to come on Sunday, but we do not think anything about that. That may be the last day of the session. In this case sometimes the first day of the session may be Sunday, so we will not be any more irreligious under the new plan than we were under the old plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was reared in an old-fashioned school of thought which took the position that it is better to work on Sunday when the ox is in the ditch than deliberately to put him in the ditch in order that we might work on Sunday.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator thinks the ox is more liable to be in the ditch on the last day of the session than on the first day?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is probably so.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska if any change has been made in the period of time for ratification by the legislatures of the several States?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am just coming to that.

Section 4 of the conference report was not in the joint resolution as it passed the Senate. The Senate conferees, however, have no objection to it, but think it is a good provision. It is not necessarily in the amendment changing the terms of office of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress, but it meets a contingency that is liable to occur and reads as follows:

SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

Section 6 was also inserted by the House, but was not in the joint resolution as it passed the Senate. As it passed the House section 6 provided that the amendment would be inoperative unless ratified within seven years after its submission and that it must appear that at least one of the branches of the legislatures passing upon it to ratify it had been elected after the submission of the amendment. The conferees compromised on that, left out the latter clause and put in the first clause, so that section 6 now reads:

SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

In effect, it is the same provision that was in the prohibition amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. If this amendment is ratified by the States, it does away with the December session of Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. That probably gives us two more months in every alternate year of the session of Congress than we get at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I should think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under the practice, if the conference report is adopted this morning, when will it be submitted to the several States?

Mr. NORRIS. Immediately, I presume, by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BARKLEY. The legislature in my State is now in session and will adjourn on the 17th of March. I should be very happy to see my State ratify it, because when I came to the House of Representatives in 1913 the first measure I introduced was similar to the one which we are now about to adopt. Personally I should be very much gratified if it could be submitted to the Kentucky Legislature in order that they might vote on it before they adjourn.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if no Senator wishes to discuss the matter, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I understand, however, that if present he would vote as I intend to vote on this question. So I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], I am advised that if present she would vote as I am about to vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I am informed that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HATFIELD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. I am informed that if present he would vote as I have voted. I therefore feel at liberty to vote and will let my vote stand.

Mr. BINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). In the absence of the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is my general pair, I am obliged to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HEBERT. Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

I am not advised as to how any of those Senators would vote if present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] are necessarily absent from the Senate. If present, they would vote "yea" on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WAGNER. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 74, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—74

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds of all Senators present and voting having voted in the affirmative, the conference report is agreed to.

Mr. COOLIDGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I was necessarily absent from the Chamber when the vote was taken on the Senate Joint Resolution 14—conference report. If I had been present, I would have voted "yea."

NOMINATION OF CHARLES A. JONAS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask leave to have until some day next week to file minority views in the case of the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States attorney, western district of North Carolina.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota the length of time he desires within which to file the views of the minority in the Jonas case? I did not hear his request.

Mr. SCHALL. Next week.

Mr. KING. Any day next week?

Mr. SCHALL. Any day next week will be all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECOMMITTAL OF BILL

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 374, being the bill (S. 2292) for the relief of Col. Frank B. Parker, be recommitted to the Committee on Finance in order that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] may have an opportunity to present some evidence to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar until 2 o'clock, and that at that time House bill 7912, the agricultural appropriation bill, shall be taken up and proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COMMENTS ON THE WORLD COURT

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some editorials appearing in American newspapers on the World Court and its decisions. These are comments from American newspapers largely in relation to the decision of the World Court regarding the Austro-German customs union.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comments on the World Court

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal]

FRANCE WINS ANOTHER VICTORY

France's employment of economic pressure to gain political ends won again.

* * * * * * *

It happens that France, which made its tacit threat some time ago, leads in the World Court decision. France leads, and with her in the decision are her satellites, the Balkan States, and naturally Italy and Spain. The decision against Austria's right to enter is clearly a gesture to justify France's position.

* * * * * * *

The quality of the minority strengthens the position of Austria and Germany, while the quality of the majority ruling against the Austro-German customs union agreement has the effect only of leaving the impression that the World Court is not the unshakable judicial tower it was built to be.

* * * * * * *

It begins to look as though France and her followers were definitely arrayed against the world. For every time France wins a victory other nations lose.

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star, September 9, 1931]

FRANCE GETS WHAT SHE WANTS

To call the abandonment of the Austro-German customs union a "voluntary renunciation" is merely a polite way of speaking. Its doom was sealed in fact by the opposition of France, expressed as soon as the proposal was announced. Whether or not the union violated the peace treaties—a point which has not yet been legally determined—it undoubtedly threatened the hegemony of France on the Continent. And France, who holds the money bags, is now able to get practically what she wants.

[From the Knickerbocker Press, Albany, N. Y.]

"The decision of the World Court in the Austro-German customs pact controversy has opened the gates for a flood of adverse criticism against the court and the principle for which it stands." The charge that the decision of the court, pronouncing the customs pact illegal, was animated by political motives is indeed unanswerable. The eight members of the court who voted against the pact represented nations which in every instance had political reasons for wishing to see the threat of an Austro-German alliance disrupted. The seven who voted otherwise came from nations which had no immediate interests to be served. "Clearly the decision was political rather than judicial."

[From the New Orleans Item]

THE WORLD COURT VOTE

When the World Court brought in its split verdict on the Austro-German customs union we remarked last week that the plainly political texture of its division would probably revive old doubts and suspicions of the court's judicial disinterestedness. That surmise is superabundantly confirmed by the course of discussion since then.

* * * * * * *

The alignment of the court in this Austro-German case has evidently been a shock to the strongest advocates of it in our country. That is plainly discerniable in the comment of the New York Times, for instance, one of the most powerful advocates of American membership in the court.

* * * * * * *

[From the Chicago Daily News, September 9, 1931]

THAT WORLD COURT ADVISORY OPINION

Many advocates of entry by this Nation into the International Court of Justice, one must think, are deeply disturbed by the inescapable implications growing out of the advisory opinion given by that tribunal in the Austro-German customs union case. It is painfully manifest that the majority in the 8-to-7 result reached its adverse conclusion by a process of reasoning that is decidedly more political than judicial.

* * * * * * *

The United States Senate has yet to decide whether or not it will accept the World Court protocols approved by the National Executive. And most assuredly neither the Senate nor enlightened public opinion will entertain the idea of adhering to a quasi-judicial tribunal that sacrifices principles of law to political considerations or the fancied interests of a particular power or alliance of powers. Such a court * * * belies its solemn pretensions and betrays instead of upholding the cause of international law and justice.

By no means the least disturbing feature of the Austro-German case is the fact that the substance of the opinion found its way out of the court a week in advance of its formal announcement. Consequently diplomats and politicians of the old unregenerate school were afforded the opportunity of using the information for their own purposes, and virtually coercing Austria and Germany into renouncing the intrinsically excellent customs union plan. A court that can not or will not protect its own important transactions from pillage, involving commercial or other ignoble uses, can not command confidence in any quarter.

* * * * * * *

[From the Chicago Journal of Commerce, September 9, 1931]

NOT YET INDEPENDENT

The chief victim of the World Court's decision in the Austro-German customs union case is the World Court. The World Court ought to exist, and the United States ought to adhere to it, in spite of its political coloring; even in spite of its bad decision in the customs union case, but the badness of the decision can hardly be denied.

Eight of the 15 judges decided that an Austro-German agreement for mutual leveling of tariff barriers would violate Austria's promise in 1922 not to compromise her freedom. The same reason would suffice for preventing Austria from entering any international agreement whatever. Seven members of this majority also declare that the customs union agreement violates the provision in the Austrian peace treaty that Austria's independence shall be maintained.

It is a bad, indefensible decision. It does not immediately hurt Austria and Germany, for their financial necessities had already forced them to mollify France by renouncing the agreement. The victim of the decision is the World Court itself. The decision is political; the judges voted with their countries, not according to their individual lights.

* * * * * * *

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post]

COURT OF WORLD POLITICS

Even friends of the so-called World Court are discouraged by its decision on the legality of the proposed Austro-German customs union.

* * * * * * *

This performance by the so-called World Court confirms the prevalent American opinion that the tribunal is not a true court of international justice, but a catspaw of the League of Nations, set up to give a semblance of legal sanction to the views and activities of that European group. This opinion of the court is not confined to the United States. Germany and Austria recognize the futility of the court when they declare that the current decision, which went against them, is a victory because of the "weight" of the dissenting opinion.

* * * * * * *

It is evident, too, that the strength of a vote is calculated not on the ability of the jurist but on the strength of the country he represents.

The World Court has brought discredit upon itself. Its usefulness in the settlement of any vital controversy that may arise in the future is nil because the world knows that the court is not a tribunal of law, but an international institute of politics.

[From the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune, September 10, 1931]

A TEMPORARY BAN

The German press regards the World Court's decision on the Austro-German customs union as a moral victory. Others may entertain the same opinion. Though not legally effective, the minority decision of the American, British, German, Dutch, Japanese, Chinese, and Belgian judges is most impressive from the judicial viewpoint. It is not so obviously political as the majority decision. Germany may properly reason that the group of judges showing the most capacity for purely judicial effort where the customs union was concerned is most deserving of respect.

[From the Minneapolis Journal]

The line-up of judges, nevertheless, is assailed as political. It is significant in this particular that Judge Anzilotti, of Italy, is of the majority, holding the Anschluss incompatible with both treaty and protocol. If he had voted against the opinion as held by the judges from countries that are friendly to France, the customs union would have been upheld, for he would have stood with the judges from countries that seek a better solution of the problems of Germany and Austria.

[From the Chicago Tribune]

* * * * * * *

The division of the court perfectly represents the political cleavage of Europe, the majority opinion dominated by the French policy of restraining the restoration of German influence, and the minority opinion by the governments disposed to assist it within reasonable bounds.

* * * * * * *

This is a disclosure, while it causes no surprise in Europe, which should be helpful in the United States, where our adherence to the court has been urged on the ground that it is an independent and disinterested juridical body, which is to be depended upon to establish and develop a system of international law based upon and governed by juridical science and free from the influence of nationalist interests and policies.

No such illusion exists in Europe in responsible quarters. It is not, we are confident, even among American advocates of the court, the controlling consideration. Our leading advocates also favor our entrance into the League of Nations, a political agency, and the fact that the court is the creature of the league and will on all important issues express the political viewpoints and interests of the constituent nationalities in legal formulæ naturally does not offend Americans who favor our entrance. * * *

[From the Butte (Mont.) Standard]

* * * * * * *

In some quarters, the advisory decision just rendered by the World Court is likely to be characterized as a political decision reached in the interests of countries which would suffer from the Austro-German customs union rather than upon the basis of exact justice and hair-line interpretation of the treaties involved. Such reaction is bound to come in the popular mind where the lineup of judges is to be found to coincide with the interest of the countries they represent.

Maybe it would be better if the statute creating the court provided that no country interested from a material standpoint in the result of a decision should be represented on the bench when such cases are heard.

[From the Fresno (Calif.) Bee]

A POLITICAL COURT

Even the New York Times, always a staunch supporter of the League of Nations and the World Court, admits editorially that the court's recent decision against the proposed Austro-German customs union was based on political rather than legal considerations.

The Times correspondent at Geneva wrote that "the judges lined up according to the political sympathies of their countries." And the Times admits:

"This almost equal division of the World Court, when asked to interpret a treaty, does not heighten its prestige.

"Apparently, political questions, although the World Court specifically renounces any right or intention to deal with them, got mixed up with the legal questions. * * * Then there was the significant grouping of the judges, on one side or the other, strongly suggesting a national interest behind the decision of at least a few of the judges."

Mild as this language is, it tells the story. And that story is exactly what opponents of American adherence to the court always have said it was.

The court is not an independent court at all. It is an appendage of the League of Nations. And the league is simply a machine for carrying out the policies of the European group able to dominate it—in this case France and her allies.

* * * * * * *

Now, how would Americans like to have a dispute involving the United States brought up for settlement before such a court as this—a court in which we are represented by but one judge, a court dominated by France and her allies, none of whom like America or could be depended upon to respect our interests?

They wouldn't like it at all. And this bad decision of the World Court certainly is going to make American adherence a much more remote prospect than it was before. In what the Times correspondent calls "this first great test of its sincerity," it has shown itself to be quite as insincere as its worst enemy ever called it.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Daily News]

When the Senate fight over American adherence to the World Court is renewed in December, opponents will use the latest major decision of the court to discredit it.

They will say the court's opinion that the proposed Austro-German customs union would violate Austria's pledge under the Geneva protocol was a political, rather than a judicial, ruling.

They will say the 8-to-7 decision of the judges, with France and her military allies providing the judges which made possible the adverse majority, proved their charge.

They will make capital of the fact that Frank B. Kellogg was one of the dissenting judges.

As an advocate of American membership in the court under the Root protocols, this newspaper is inclined to admit that there probably is some truth in those charges. It looks to us as if political considerations may have influenced some of the judges.

[From the Des Moines (Iowa) Register]

The World Court has ruled adversely to Austria and Germany on the issue of the proposed Austro-German customs union that was referred to the court by the league council for an advisory opinion. It may be added that, in view of changed conditions, an adverse ruling was a "relief" to the very powers that originally sprung the agreement on a surprised world, since they had already been constrained to promise to abandon it. But that is something not related to the court.

The court's ruling brings to the front three questions:

1. What, precisely, was it that the court decided?

2. What will be the effect on the future of "anschluss," or the movement for Austro-German unity?

3. What will be the effect on the prestige of the court?

The court, it should be understood, did not pass on the question of the desirability or inevitability of Austro-German union, economic or political. Just as our own courts, including our Supreme Court, frequently do, it passed on a specific question as to the legality of the proposed customs union under the written international contracts called the treaty of St. Germain and the first Geneva protocol.

The treaty of St. Germain between Austria and the Allies bound Austria to "abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence," unless she first got the consent of the league council. The first Geneva protocol bound Austria, at a time when several of the Allies came to her relief financially, "to abstain from any negotiations or from any economic or financial engagement calculated directly or indirectly to compromise this independence."

In 1931 Germany and Austria announced their plan for a virtually complete customs union. Austria did not seek the consent of the league council before concluding the agreement. The question of Austria's right to create the customs union in spite of the treaty pledges was referred to the World Court. And the court, after long and thorough hearings, with all the interested powers represented, decided by an 8-to-7 vote that the agreement contravened the obligations of the Geneva protocol of 1922. One of the eight judges—only one—concluded that the treaty of St. Germain was also violated. The seven dissenting judges, including Kellogg, of America, held that the economic clause of the 1922 protocol added nothing to the obligations of the treaty of St. Germain, that the proposed customs union would not be an alienation of Austria's independence, and that therefore Austria was within her rights.

It is obviously a matter on which judges of any court might readily disagree. There appears not the slightest reason to impugn the integrity of any judge.

As to the effect of the ruling on "anschluss," it is by no means certain that the whole episode may not increase rather than lessen the probability of its ultimate success. The economic urge for Austro-German union has not been diminished. The political urge is presumably in abeyance but for the present. A cause that is bound to succeed eventually is often advanced, not retarded, by a clear focusing upon it, and the devotion to such a cause can often be fixed and increased by an open clash with the forces opposed to it.

The World Court's prestige can hardly be hurt by its first important advisory opinion, considering the episode as a whole, though doubtless we shall hear some criticisms from our senatorial Hiram Johnsons. The court's ruling will be accepted—there is no question of that. And that it sets an excellent precedent from that standpoint nobody can deny. The court's existence made possible a peaceful and legal settlement of a question that was very dangerous in its early stages. The divided bench—a division so close that one vote would have swung it—contains no suggestion of scandal and is certainly no discredit.

Whether Austria ever should have been compelled to sign the treaty of St. Germain and subsequently the protocol of 1922 is a wholly different matter. It is one with reference to which the World Court has no responsibility whatever.

[From the Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune]

A VERY HUMAN COURT

The critics of the World Court are having considerable sport with that august body because its decision adjudging the proposed Austro-German customs union as contrary to international law smacked so openly of partisanship.

Thus it is pointed out that France and its two satellites, Poland and Rumania, were numbered among the eight countries whose court representative opposed the anschluss, while a German representative, on the contrary, was found among the minority of seven which upheld it.

Just what this proves about the worthlessness of the World Court it is a little difficult to see, although the Baltimore Evening Sun voices the opinion of the skeptics rather well when it brands the decision as "the product of partisan judges who voted like ordinary politicians for the boys back home."

In a sense, we suppose, such criticism is justified.

[From the Norfolk (Va.) Virginian-Pilot]

The lines of reasoning in the majority and minority opinions of the World Court in the Austro-German tariff union case are available for the present only in condensed summaries, but, taken from these, it is apparent that the majority opinion was colored by grounds which critics of the decision will not hesitate to call political.

* * * * * * *

There is more than an implication here that the majority judges have concerned themselves with something besides the questions of legality—that they have assumed also the mission of estimating the proposed pact's speculative political consequences.

* * * * * * *

The decision has armed America's anticourt bitter enders with a new and formidable weapon.

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

THE TROUBLE WITH THE WORLD COURT

The reaction in this country to the World Court's advisory opinion on the Austro-German customs union has inevitably been unfavorable. Some of the strongest friends of the court have expressed the greatest disappointment. It could hardly be otherwise. For the line-up of the court exhibited a depressingly strong political bias, and its decision by an 8-to-7 vote robbed its findings of all weight or pretense to finality. Faced by a major issue, affecting the fundamentals of European organization, the court failed to function either judicially or effectively.

As a staunch believer in the principle of the court we think these hasty criticisms do much less than justice to the actual status of the institution while missing the real point of the failure.

* * * * * * *

The tragedy is threefold. The court has suffered a severe loss of prestige. Its members are just so much further from achieving the habit of a judicial approach to international problems. And as long as the advisory opinion remains in the court statute, the same demoralizing influence can recur again and again.

The moral seems to us clear. The advisory opinion can scarcely ever be of real help to the league as the current decision shows. It can and will plague the court as long as it endures. If it were eliminated, the adherence of this country would be a far simpler matter. Why do not the real friends of the court work for the elimination of the advisory opinion entire?

[From the Rockford (Ill.) Register-Republic]

Various influential newspapers of the United States which have been procourt and proleague these many seasons now condemn this first major decision of the court as one not dictated by law at all but by national, political, and racial prejudice.

* * * * * * *

We have the picture clearly now. If we adhere to the court, as the Senate of the United States will be asked to bring about next winter, we shall violate the warning of Washington against entanglement in the political affairs of Europe.

* * * * * * *

Americans will not easily be led into surrendering our own independence of action in return for an opportunity to participate in such judicial settlement of continental free-for-alls.

MORE LIGHT SHED ON WORLD COURT PERILS

* * * * * * *

The court action in this customs union case should be warning of what goes on there; of how the court is not so much an impartial judicial body as an instrument for giving legal color to the programs and policies of the dominating powers of the Continent.

What chance would America have, with one voice against the combined vote of the European members, should she have to submit questions to the court—such questions, for example, as the Monroe doctrine?

* * * * * * *

If she be wise, she will avoid such a hazard as though it were the plague.

WORLD COURT'S DIVIDED OPINION

By the manner in which it divided on the advisory opinion on the German-Austrian customs union, the World Court showed that on questions affecting the policy and interests of their own States the judges are apt to be swayed by bias.

* * * * * * *

Close division of the court along the political lines on which Europe is divided suggests that it is not qualified to give advice on political questions of great magnitude, and that the peace conference in drawing the league covenant erred by imposing this duty upon it.

The function of legal adviser to the league is that of an attorney general, though there would be great difficulty in finding an international lawyer of the highest ability who was free from even unconscious opinion contrary to his nation's interest.

* * * * * * *

[From the Kansas City (Mo.) Star, September 13, 1931]

* * * * * * *

One of the strongest reasons against American membership in the court is the danger to the United States in submitting itself to a tribunal packed against it in advance. European nations generally are jealous of the wealth and power of America. There is no question where the sympathies of a majority of the World Court judges would be in a question involving American interests.

* * * * * * *

The United States always has been a leader in international arbitration. It has shown its position by the many special arbitration treaties it has negotiated. But it simply could not afford to agree to go before the court set up as an auxiliary to the League of Nations; a court dominated, as now has been demonstrated, by European politics.

[From the Charleston (S. C.) Evening Post]

The prospect of the United States adhering to the protocol for the World Court, never too brilliant, despite the earnest recommendation of President Hoover, who has followed in this each of his predecessors since the war, has been seriously dimmed by the recent close division on the proposed Austro-German customs union. The court divided on the ruling 8 to 7, so close a decision as to subtract all weight of finality from the decision. Moreover, it is the accepted opinion that the decision was made on political rather than on judicial considerations. The line-up was distinctly according to the grouping of the governments represented on the court in their attitude toward the question of a strengthening of the Central Powers of Europe. Those under the influence of France, for example, ruled against the union, while those which are disposed to regard as desirable a better balance of power in Europe found the union not in violation of the treaties. In the liberal group Judge Kellogg, the American member of the court, was included.

The effect of this political division of the court has been seized on by opponents of the institution in this country, already in great strength, and they are confident that they will be able to defeat any motion for adherence by this country at the coming session of Congress. * * * And now the court has materially detracted from its prestige by its own display of political bias, and those who have protested against the United States ever consenting to submit to such a tribunal issues involving the national interest of this country have something substantial as an exhibit to fortify their opposition.

The chances are that the World Court will once more fail of acceptance by the United States, and it must be admitted there is, in this latest exhibition of its working, something to give concern as to the usefulness of the institution. The alarm sounded by antagonists of the danger to the United States from the court, is of course, absurd. Its decisions are not absolutely binding and there is no machinery of enforcement. The findings are no more than advisory. But it is distinctly discouraging that they should be made in a political rather than a judicial spirit, as this one obviously was.

[From the Greensboro Daily News]

The court's decision was far from unanimous * * *. It is logical to presume that political considerations entered into their deliberations to a degree, that they necessarily reflected something of the viewpoint among the populace of the countries which they represent. Jurists from the group of nations generally believed to be predominated by French influences voted against the pact * * *.

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican]

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican, while claiming that the value of the so-called court was "strikingly shown" by the developments of the case and the decision of the court itself, comments:

"It is disappointing that the decision was so close, and still more disappointing that it was obviously determined by political rather than legal considerations * * *.

"It would be difficult to feel very enthusiastic about the World Court or very hopeful for its future, if we had to look forward to a long line of 8-to-7 decisions in which law might be subordinated to expediency or politics."

[From the Baltimore Evening Sun]

The product of partisan judges who voted like ordinary politicians for the boys back home.

[From the Chicago Evening Post]

By a vote of 8 to 7, the pact was ruled illegal. Unfortunately for the prestige of the court, the cleavage was almost wholly on partisan lines, with France and her continental allies swinging the majority vote. Former Secretary of State Kellogg, the American member of the court, voted with the minority, which held that "It can not find reasons explaining how the régime would endanger her (Austria's) independence."

World Court skeptics can claim, with some show of justice, that wherever there is a shadow of doubt, politics rather than law dominates the court's postwar decisions * * *.

[From the Detroit Free Press]

WORLD COURT "JUSTICE"

Analysis of the World Court's 8-to-7 decision in the Austro-German customs union case, according to political alignment, will not provide any ammunition for advocates of the United States entering that tribunal without adequate safeguards.

The eight judges who held the proposed customs union to be illegal, with respect to the Geneva protocol of 1922, were those representing France, Spain and Italy, Cuba, Salvador and Colombia, and Poland and Rumania, two of France's allies. The six judges who joined the German judge in finding nothing illegal in the proposed union were those representing the United States, Great Britain, China, Japan, Belgium, and the Netherlands. Thus the line, with the exception of Belgium, was clearly drawn between France and her political and racial allies and the non-Latinic members of the court.

A decision so suspiciously political in the first case of major importance coming before the World Court is bound to make even the most ardent champions of that institution in this country stop, look, and listen before crossing the tracks into its exalted precincts.

[From the Los Angeles (Calif.) Daily News]

The announcement that Germany and Austria have abandoned their proposed economic pact seems to create an undue amount of enthusiasm and surprise in France, where the original plan for an economic "United States of Europe" emanated. The story of the Austro-German retreat is but another example of the operations of the ruling power that animates nations, as well as men—the power of money. It is now revealed that while France did not make her acquiescence in the Hoover moratorium proposal openly conditional with the dissolution of the anschluss, there was a distinct understanding that the big German loan, an essential part of the moratorium, would not be consummated until the pact was dissolved. As the World Court was just about to announce that the alliance was illegal the Berlin-Vienna announcement was only a diplomatic gesture to make the retreat graceful.

[From Chicago, Ill.]

* * * * * * *

We Germans, as we have seen, can not rely on international courts of arbitration nor on the League of Nations. * * *

[From the Reno (Nev.) Evening Gazette]

Already the charge has been made that the smaller nations, who cast the deciding votes, joined with France in writing a political opinion, and seemingly that is what occurred. In other words, France, through her numerous alliances and by political trading, it is alleged, was able to gather in enough votes to win her case.

The incident has not strengthened the court in American eyes.

[From the Cincinnati (Ohio) Enquirer, September 10, 1931]

Unmistakably, there is evidence here of judges voting in terms of their own nations. If we rule out the judges whose own governments were closely interested in the controversy—that is, Germany, France, Poland, and Rumania—the decision would have been favorable to the customs union instead of unfavorable.

This can not fail to be something of a blow to the prestige of the World Court. * * *

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News Sentinel]

If any further proof had been needed of the incompetence of the World Court as a tribunal of justice, it was furnished the other day, when that much-touted coterie of League of Nations darlings decided that the proposed Austro-German customs union was illegal—by a vote of 8 to 7 * * *.

The court's charter declares it to be comprised of a "body of independent judges, elected regardless of their nationality from among persons of high moral character," etc. Yet, please observe that the justices who voted against the customs union were from France, Poland, Rumania, Spain, Cuba, Colombia, Italy, and Salvador. This is the court of "impartial justice"—the "high court of the nations"—which the United States is asked to join.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer]

Unmistakably, there is evidence here of judges voting in terms of the interests of their own nations. If we rule out the judges whose own governments were closely interested in the controversy, that is, Germany, France, Poland, and Rumania, the decision would have been favorable to the customs union, instead of unfavorable.

This can not fail to be something of a blow to the prestige of the World Court. But assuming that approximate justice is better than hard-fisted national force, and that an international court is desirable, the need is clearly for active American participation. This at least would lend a greater impartiality to the court and a greater weight to its decisions * * *.

[From the New York Times]

A fear that the behavior of the World Court in the matter of the German-Austrian customs alliance would be seized upon by American enemies of the court was justified last week. Washington dispatches related that Senators who have steadily opposed American adhesion to the court, with or without the Root formula, are prepared to fight the proposal again and believe that they at last have definite evidence to support their hitherto theoretical argument. This evidence the Senators hold to have been supplied by these circumstances of the World Court's opinion—its political cast; the advance intimation, so that the abandonment of the plan at Geneva by Germany and Austria before the decision was made public could be charged to foreknowledge, and inferences to be gathered from the division among the judges.

Realistic friends of the World Court are agreed that its prestige has been deeply injured. There can be little doubt that the chances of American adhesion have been badly damaged. In the Senate there has been no particular enthusiasm for the court. The protocols have been kicked about committee rooms. Presidents, while urging them upon the Senate in grave and lofty terms, have been inclined to let things go at that. No real administration effort to press the issue has been made.

Meanwhile the enemies of American adhesion have attacked the advisory-opinion function of the court from two angles. They have expressed resentment at the prospect that the United States should be given European advice on its sovereign rights, thrusting aside the answer that, by formula, this prospect is excluded. They have contended that in its decision the court is certain to decide from the political viewpoint when great nations are involved. The recent line-up of the court has given strength to the latter contention and color to the former. When the World Court divides 8 to 7 on an advisory opinion, sought by the league council, it is obvious that this opinion is of no value. And when the detail of the division shouts "politics" it is obvious that the charge must lie.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 88) to authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof, was announced as first in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1663) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 209) granting an increase of pension to Mary Willoughby Osterhaus was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 111) for the relief of Rosa E. Plummer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a commission on a national museum of engineering and industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that this bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

The bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) to investigate the effect of the depreciation of foreign-currency values upon importations of important commodities into the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2377) authorizing an appropriation to defray the expenses of participation by the United States Government in the Second Polar Year Program, August 1, 1932, to August 31, 1933, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 212) for the relief of Messrs. Short, Ross, Shaw, and Mayhood was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 213) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Kenneth Carpenter was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there are several bills similar in character to the one just announced to the consideration of which objection was made a few days ago by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. I notice he has just come into the Chamber. I ask that the bills may go over temporarily until the Senator may have an opportunity to examine the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the request of the Senator from Utah, Order of Business 183, being Senate bill 213, and Order of Business 184, being Senate bill 219, will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2335) for the relief of O. R. York was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am making an inquiry as to the rule of the Post Office Department with respect to cases like that covered by this bill, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH E. BOURRIE CO.

The bill (S. 2570) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of Joseph Bourrie Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, as I recall, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] asked that that bill go over when it was last reached on the calendar.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not think this is one of the bills to which the Senator from New Hampshire had reference. Will not the Senator withdraw his objection, with the understanding that, if it is one of the bills to which the Senator from New Hampshire objects, it may subsequently be reconsidered?

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senator will have action on the bill reconsidered in the event the Senator from New Hampshire should so desire, I will not persist in the objection.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, does the Senator from Connecticut ask that that bill go over?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have asked the Senator from Connecticut to withdraw his objection, with the understanding that, if it subsequently proves to be one of the bills to which the Senator from New Hampshire is objecting, action on it will be reconsidered.

Mr. HOWELL. I am satisfied the Senator from New Hampshire is not objecting to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut withdraw his objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Joseph E. Bourrie Co. for refund of $1,055.70, included in the amount of a certified check submitted by it as a guarantee with bids on two items of construction work at Camp Grayling, Mich., the total amount of which was collected and paid into the Treasury, although $1,055.70 included in such check was for a guarantee on a bid which was rejected, and to allow not to exceed $1,055.70 in full and final settlement of any and all claims arising out of the transaction. There is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1,055.70, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

LOANS TO DRAINAGE DISTRICTS, ETC.

The bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, there are certain amendments on the desk to this bill. I desire to offer them en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DICKINSON. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILL PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 36) to change the name of the island of "Porto Rico" to "Puerto Rico" was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2062) for the relief of Adam Augustus Shafer was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM C. RIVES

The bill (S. 2058) for the relief of William C. Rives was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy William C. Rives, late of the United States Navy, shall be held and considered to have served honorably 90 days during the war with Spain: Provided, That no pension, pay, or bounty shall be held to have accrued by reason of this act prior to its passage.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2059) for the relief of Albert Ross was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2060) for the relief of Otto Schluter was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. The report on this bill by the Secretary of the Navy is adverse, and, in the absence of an explanation, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2375) for the relief of Roscoe Meadows was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2914) to authorize appropriations to pay in part the liability of the United States to the Indian pueblos herein named, under the terms of the act of June 7, 1924, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WAIVER OF INDICTMENT IN CERTAIN CRIMINAL CASES

The bill (S. 2655) providing for waiver of prosecution by indictment in certain criminal proceedings was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I appeal to the Senator to withhold his objection in order that I may explain the purpose of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; I withhold my objection.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin in a preliminary way that his colleague [Mr. BLAINE] assured me that if the first committee amendment is adopted he has no desire to press the amendment which he had printed yesterday, and which is now lying on the table.

The proposed legislation will accomplish a substantial economy to the Government. It will be recalled that in his message received in the Senate day before yesterday the President urged legislation of this character as a means of expediting the administration of criminal law, and saving money in connection therewith. This measure will permit an accused person to waive his constitutional right to be prosecuted only on an indictment, but in doing so he must waive such right in writing and in open court, thus safeguarding the rights of any accused person against the employment of what we commonly call third-degree methods. I think the measure is a wholesome one, and will speed the administration of criminal law, and at the same time reduce the expenses in connection therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no objection, in view of the statement made by the Senator from New Mexico that my colleague [Mr. BLAINE] does not desire to press his amendment.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 6, after the word "shall," to insert "in open court and"; and, in line 10, after the word "him," to insert "except that no such waiver shall be allowed if the accused has had a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner or other examining magistrate, which examination has resulted in the discharge of the accused," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all prosecutions for capital or otherwise infamous crimes, in the courts of the United States and the courts of the District of Columbia, shall be by presentment or indictment of a grand jury unless the accused shall, in open court and in writing, and under such rules as the court may prescribe, expressly waive prosecution by presentment or indictment, and consent to the filing of an information against him, except that no such waiver shall be allowed if the accused has had a preliminary examination before a United States commissioner or other examining magistrate, which examination has resulted in the discharge of the accused. In the event of such waiver the prosecution shall, with the approval of the court, be by information, and any judgment rendered and sentence imposed in any such case shall have the same force and effect in all respects as if the same had been rendered and imposed pursuant to a prosecution by presentment or indictment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1153) to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1003) for the relief of Capt. Jacob M. Pearce, United States Marine Corps, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING and Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1009) for the relief of George Edwin Godwin was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2883) prescribing regulations for carrying on the business of lighter service from any of the ports of the United States to stationary ships or barges located offshore, and for the purpose of promoting the safety of navigation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, in the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] I ask that that bill go over. I make this suggestion as it came to me from the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who is absent from the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1469) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN A. PEARCE

The bill (S. 1030) for the relief of John A. Pierce was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will ask if the objection can not be withdrawn, because the Senator who introduced this bill is favorable to this form of dealing with the subject.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$500, and $50 per month thereafter, not to exceed 40 months"; in line 7, after "John A.," to strike out "Pierce" and insert "Pearce"; and in the same line, after the words "in full," to strike out "payment" and insert "settlement of all claims against the Government," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500, and $50 per month thereafter, not to exceed 40 months, to John A. Pearce, in full settlement of all claims against the Government for injuries sustained by him on July 19, 1918, when he was shot by a sentry at the Aberdeen Proving Grounds in the State of Maryland.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John A. Pearce."

JOHN STRATIS

The bill (S. 3447) for the relief of John Stratis was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to John Stratis, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, representing the face value of two Liberty bonds in the amount of $500 each, deposited by him as security for a public charge and departure bond in the sum of $1,000, executed by him on account of Vasilios Kaplandis, an alien, conditioned upon the alien traveling in transit through the United States within 15 days and forfeited through breach of such condition, subsequent hearings by the Department of Labor having developed that the alien had a former residence in this country and was entitled to admission to the United States without regard to the quota law.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 166) to print the pamphlets entitled "Draft of Mooney-Billings Report" and "Appendix Containing Official Documents" was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2494) to amend section 4 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, passed and approved March 4, 1925, relating to the compensation of Members of and Delegates to Congress, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2495) to repeal section 17 of the act passed and approved July 28, 1866, relating to mileage of Members of Congress, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely and will be passed over.

The bill (S. 95) to amend the second paragraph of section 6 of the civil service retirement act of May 29, 1930 (relating to persons retired for disability), was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3051) to reinstate Lawrence L. Myatt and Miller S. Burgin as midshipmen in the United States Naval Academy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I assume that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] will want that bill to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 276) for the construction and equipment of a hospital on Crow Indian Reservation was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES PARSHALL

The bill (S. 278) for the relief of Charles Parshall, Fort Peck Indian allottee, of the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles Parshall, a Fort Peck Indian allottee, of Poplar, Mont., the sum of $710, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for and in full satisfaction of any claim the aforesaid Charles Parshall may have against the Government by reason of the refusal, neglect, and failure of the Secretary of the Interior to admit Charles Parshall, an Indian of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, to the Fort Peck Hospital, a Government hospital, thereby necessitating said Charles Parshall to spend and pay out of his own funds the said sum of $710.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2987) providing for the construction and equipment of a hospital upon the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I objected a moment ago, and I object to this bill for the reason that the Interior Department appropriation bill will be before the Senate in a day or two, and the question of the necessity for hospitals on the various reservations will be under consideration, and the matter may then be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DISPOSITION OF VEHICLES, ETC., SEIZED ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS

The bill (S. 3654) to authorize turning over to the Indian Service vehicles, vessels, and supplies seized and forfeited for violation of liquor laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, do I understand that there is objection to this bill?

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection pending an explanation. I did not know that the Senator is present. Let the Senator explain the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this bill simply provides that where automobiles are seized on an Indian reservation because of violation of the prohibition law, by order of the court they may be transferred to the Indian Bureau for use in the Government service.

Under the present law, in a great many instances a good deal of Indian money is being spent for the enforcement of the prohibition laws, but no benefit returns to the Indian tribes in a financial way. This will be some help to them, and a help to the department in enforcing the law by reason of having these automobiles.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Who is to determine whether or not an automobile sequestered in the manner indicated is necessary? We know that the appropriation bills which are passed through the Senate give to the Indian Bureau far more than it should receive under the uneconomical manner in which the bureau is administered.

Mr. FRAZIER. This is to be done by order of the court.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that provision is made in the appropriation bills for automobiles for the Indian Bureau, and with the appropriations made they will purchase the necessary automobiles. This bill would give to them additional ones, without any necessity therefor.

Mr. FRAZIER. This is to be done by order of the court; and, of course, the machine would be transferred by order of the judge.

Mr. KING. Yes; but there is no discretion in the court, and if the automobiles are not transferred to the Indian Bureau, there is no provision made for their transference to some bureau or agency of the Government which would require them. It seems to me that with the well-known lack of economy in the Indian Bureau, and the anxiety with which they reach out to get larger appropriations, to give to them, without any necessity, these automobiles that may be taken, is unwise.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that on 80 reservations where they have tribal funds and the appropriations to conduct the affairs of the Indians on those reservations are taken out of their tribal funds, their money is used for the enforcement of the prohibition law. If an Indian is arrested and fined, the fine goes to the county where the arrest was made, but not back to the Indian fund. In this case they would get some benefit out of it by having transferred to them this automobile that was taken there while its operator was engaged in violation of the law.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will let the bill go over for the day, I am going to offer an amendment to provide that automobiles and all paraphernalia seized shall be disposed of after due notice, and that the proceeds derived from the sale thereof shall go into the tribal funds, so as to let the Indians get it instead of a lot of Government officials.

I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 51) to authorize the building up of the United States Navy to the strength permitted by the Washington and London naval treaties was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RAINY RIVER BRIDGE, BAUDETTE, MINN.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the procedure, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to Order of Business 334, House bill 5064, which is a bridge bill, involving an international bridge in Minnesota. The Senators from Minnesota tell me that the project is ready to proceed to immediate construction the moment this authorization is granted. I am fearful that the bill may not be reached during the morning hour, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to take it up at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 334, House bill 5064, the title of which will be stated by the clerk.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 5064) authorizing Vernon W. O'Connor, of St. Paul, Minn., his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Rainy River at or near Baudette, Minn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, after line 20, to insert:

> The said Vernon W. O'Connor, his successors or assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of the bridge constructed under the authority of this act file with the Secretary of War an itemized statement under oath showing the actual original cost of such bridge and its approaches and appurtenances, which statement shall include any expenditures actually made for engineering and legal services; and any fees, discounts, and other expenditures actually incurred in connection with the financing thereof. Such itemized statement of cost shall be investigated by the Secretary of War at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, and for that purpose the said Vernon W. O'Connor, his successors or assigns, in such manner as may be deemed proper, shall make available and accessible all records connected with the construction and financing of such bridge, and the findings of the Secretary of War as to the actual cost of such bridge shall be made a part of the records of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS ADVERSELY REPORTED

The bill (S. 828) granting compensation to David Samuel Goldstein was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this is the first of a large number of bills reported adversely by the Finance Committee. The first bill happens to be one introduced by me, and is reported unfavorably by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I shall not make any objection to the report being accepted, but I think it is not inappropriate that the general policy of the committee should be stated at this time.

All these bills have been considered by a subcommittee of the Finance Committee on World War veterans' relief. As a member of that subcommittee I will state the policy of the committee.

Most of these bills seek, by special legislation, to extend the benefits of the World War veterans' acts and amendments to individual veterans. Unless some administrative error or legal technicality appears that has worked detriment to the person in whose favor special legislation is sought, it is the policy of the committee to report such special bills adversely. Nearly all of these bills, including the one now under consideration, seek to give to an individual some special exception outside the rights defined in the general law. In many cases the veteran's case has already been adjudicated unfavorably to the petitioner by the Veterans' Administration, and special bills have been presented to change the adverse ruling.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course "legal technicality" is a rather flexible term, not susceptible of exact definition; but, if I understand what the Senator has in mind, where a bureau has passed upon an application for compensation, and the application has either been denied or the applicant has not received the amount to which he thinks he is entitled, it is not the policy of the committee to undertake to review those cases.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is exactly the position of the committee. In other words, we do not propose to extend to Congress the administrative features of this law, or to make it a court to decide the rights of individual veterans. If we enter that domain we will have millions of special bills before us, for once the precedent is established every veteran who thinks his case has not been adequately adjudicated may properly petition the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. That does not mean, of course, that if an individual case, isolated as it might be, should arise, in which a man might be entitled to all the benefits of the compensation law, but through some technical status which could not be foreseen by Congress in the enactment of the law he would be denied, there would not be relief.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are some such cases, and they have been reported favorably. For illustration, where a veteran has had a dishonorable discharge through error, and should have had an honorable discharge, and has been deprived of the benefits of the compensation to which he was entitled had he had an honorable discharge in the first place, the committee would report favorably.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is, a case where, through the error of somebody in an administrative capacity, the man has been denied justice or has been put in a situation where the bureau itself can not act upon his case.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has correctly stated the situation.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I want to state a case which has come to my personal knowledge, and ascertain whether the Senator thinks the veteran would be entitled to relief at the hands of Congress.

A veteran was indicted in a State court, charged with murder. He was convicted in the trial court. By reason of that charge and the conviction he was dishonorably discharged from the Army. After he was discharged, the Supreme Court reversed the case and remanded it to the trial court, where it was subsequently dismissed, thus clearing the veteran so far as the civil courts were concerned; but in the meantime, as I have said, he had been given a dishonorable discharge due solely to the charge of murder and the original conviction. The bureau is powerless in that case.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest to the Senator that of course the bureau is powerless while that veteran's record remains, and so would the Finance Committee be powerless while that dishonorable record remained. There is a remedy for that veteran, however, namely, to file a bill requesting that he be given the benefit of the World War veterans' act notwithstanding his dishonorable discharge. That bill would go to the Committee on Naval Affairs if he served in the Navy and to the Committee on Military Affairs if he served in the Army. Many such bills are before those committees, and favorable reports have been made where errors have occurred, such as in the case cited by the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. I have introduced such a bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Where is the bill?

Mr. BRATTON. It is before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I happen to be familiar with the practice of the Committee on Naval Affairs. In a case of the kind described a bill would be reported favorably.

Mr. BRATTON. The attitude of the Finance Committee would not preclude such a veteran from relief at the hands of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We would not attempt to determine a particular award to the veteran, for that would require medical testimony. That must be done by an administrative bureau.

Mr. BRATTON. I understand.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Because of the record being a bar against consideration of his case by the Veterans' Administration, we would recommend legislation which would remove the dishonorable discharge, so that he, like other veterans, would have an opportunity to prove his case.

Mr. BRATTON. The technical procedure would be to introduce a bill to correct his military record?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. BRATTON. And the enactment of the bill would result in him becoming entitled to compensation from the bureau?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I recommend that course to the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. I am pursuing that course, but I was concerned lest the attitude stated by the Senator might conflict with that procedure.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say that a case very similar to that stated by the Senator from New Mexico came before our subcommittee, and was rereferred to the Committee on Military Affairs, or Naval Affairs, in order that correction of his record might be made. There will then be no question on the part of the Veterans' Administration, and provided the man's record were cleared, his claim would be paid.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought perhaps the explanation I have made on these reports from the Finance Committee should be put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills on the calendar beginning with Order of Business No. 299 and extending through Order of Business No. 307, having been reported adversely, will go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, who has requested that those bills go over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ordered that they go over. They have all been adversely reported.

Mr. KING. I ask that the reports of the committee be accepted, and that the bills be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be entered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask that the report of the committee accompanying Senate bill 828 be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Sen. Rept. No. 281, 72d Cong., 1st sess.]

GRANTING COMPENSATION TO DAVID SAMUEL GOLDSTEIN

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 828):

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 828) granting compensation to David Samuel Goldstein, having considered the same, report it back to the Senate and recommend that the bill do not pass.

This bill would give the claimant retroactive compensation from the date of his discharge in 1918 down to 1926, which latter date is one year before he first applied for compensation.

The report of the Veterans' Administration is as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, January 13, 1932.

HON. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: Reference is made to your letter of December 29, 1931, transmitting a copy of S. 828, Seventy-second Congress, a bill granting compensation to David Samuel Goldstein, and requesting a report thereon.

The records in this case disclose that the veteran served in the Navy prior to the World War, during which time he received treatment for a mental disability. He entered service during the World War on April 24, 1917, and was discharged January 4, 1918, because of inaptitude. Claim for compensation was not executed until May 17, 1927, and although the rating now in effect would entitle the claimant to a compensable rating from date of discharge, as you are aware, no payments can be effected for more than one year prior to the date of application for benefits because of the provisions contained in section 210 of the World War veterans' act, as amended. The proposed bill provides for the payment of temporary total disability benefits from date of discharge until May 18, 1926, or until compensation became legally payable under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended.

An investigation conducted by the regional office in Boston, Mass., indicates that the claimant lost approximately four months from his work between the time of his discharge and the date he entered the Grafton State Hospital in June of 1927. He has been in receipt of a temporary total rating since May 19, 1927, and payments covering this award are now going forward.

Whether or not a special bill should be enacted excepting this claimant from the general provisions of the act in question is a matter for the Congress to decide. It is the policy of the Veterans' Administration to recommend special legislation only when a legal technicality or administrative error has worked detriment to the person in whose favor special legislation is sought. This claimant does not come within either of these exceptions.

This bill seems identical in substance with S. 2775, Seventy-first Congress, on which a report was made to your committee on February 12, 1930.

A copy of this letter is inclosed for your use.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to say that the report on that bill is about the same as the reports on the other bills reported adversely.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2827, to amend the act known as the "Perishable agricultural commodities act, 1930," approved June 10, 1930, which is Order of Business No. 310, and follows the bills adversely reported.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We have not yet reached that order of business.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I understand that, but it follows the bills adversely reported.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has a right to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill even out of order. That is his request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order of business has not been reached.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I intended the motion which I submitted a moment ago to indefinitely postpone Senate bill 828 and others to refer to those which are in the category referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, from Order of Business 299 to Order of Business 307, inclusive.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator moves that all bills reported adversely be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. KING. Those whose calendar numbers I have given.

Mr. MCNARY. Does the Senator make that applicable to all bills on the calendar with adverse reports?

Mr. KING. No; just those referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago, and which come within the category to which he referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that there are three different places on the calendar where there are groups of bills with adverse reports, two of which groups we have not yet reached.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the action suggested by the Senator from Utah being taken, but there are a number of other bills on the calendar with adverse reports, and Senators may wish to have them taken up. Therefore I suggest that we postpone indefinitely only those where there is no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bills adversely reported on page 7 of the calendar will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Have Calendar Nos. 299 to 307 been indefinitely postponed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have been.

SALARIES OF MEMBERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE FARM BOARD

The bill (S. 2493) to amend section 2 of an act known as the agricultural marketing act, passed and approved June 15, 1929, relating to salaries of members and employees, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ELECTRIC CURRENT IN HAWAII

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 307) to approve Act No. 256 of the session laws of 1931 of the Territory of Hawaii, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric current for light and power within the districts of North Kona and South Kona, on the island and county of Hawaii, Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this is one of the bills in the usual form which has passed the Legislature of Hawaii under the organic act and has to be submitted to Congress for approval. It does not grant an exclusive franchise. The capital is raised wholly in the neighborhood. The company referred to is a very small one, the amount subscribed varying from $100 to $1,500.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did I understand the Senator to say the franchise is not exclusive?

Mr. BINGHAM. The franchise is not exclusive.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERISHABLE AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2827) to amend the act known as the "Perishable agricultural commodities act, 1930," approved June 10, 1930 ,which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, on page 2, line 6, to strike out the words "No person buying such commodity in intrastate commerce for canning shall be considered as a 'dealer'" and to insert the words "No person buying any such commodity for canning and/or processing within the State where grown shall be considered a 'dealer,' whether or not the canned or processed product is to be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection 6 of section 1 of the act known as the perishable agricultural commodities act, 1930, approved June 10, 1930, be hereby amended to read as follows:

"(6) The term 'dealer' means any person engaged in the business of buying or selling in carloads any perishable agricultural commodity in interstate or foreign commerce, except that (A) no producer shall be considered as a 'dealer' in respect of sales of any such commodity of his own raising; and (B) no person buying any such commodity solely for sale at retail shall be considered as a 'dealer' in respect of any such commodity in any calendar year until his purchases of such commodity in carloads in such year are in excess of 20. No person buying any such commodity for canning and/or processing within the State where grown shall be considered a 'dealer,' whether or not the canned or processed product is to be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce. Any person not considered as a 'dealer' under clauses (A) and (B) may elect to secure a license under the provisions of section 3, and in such case and while the license is in effect such person shall be considered as a 'dealer.' As used in this paragraph the term 'in carloads' includes corresponding wholesale or jobbing quantities as defined for any such commodity by the Secretary."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland give us an explanation of this measure?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Certainly. It is a bill to amend the act known as the perishable agricultural commodities act of 1930, which was introduced at the request of the canners of my State. The canning industry is one of the most important in the State.

In the administration of the perishable agricultural commodities act of 1930 by the Department of Agriculture the department does not interpret the act as applying to canned goods in interstate commerce. The canners of the State, depending practically entirely upon domestic production for their raw material, feel that an undue burden has been laid upon them by the interpretation of the act which necessitates their taking out a license.

However, the department feels, so I am told, that it would not be wise to altogether exclude canners from the provisions of the act, but is agreeable to not requiring a license to be taken out by those buying their raw material within the States for canning in interstate commerce.

The problem, therefore, was to so amend the law as to make it unnecessary for the canners to take out a license because of the intrastate character of their business from a purchasing standpoint. This has been done in the bill which I introduced through amending subsection 6 of section 1 of the act by inserting the sentence:

No person buying any such commodity for canning and/or processing within the State where grown shall be considered a "dealer," whether or not the canned or processed product is to be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce.

Prior to the submitting of the amendment I conferred with the officials of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics having administration of the act in charge, and also arranged conferences for the representatives of the canners of the State with these officials to discuss the matter. The amendment, as drawn, has the unofficial approval of the heads of the bureau above referred to. It is understood, of course, that it was impossible to secure an official approval until the proposed amendment should be submitted by the Committee on Agriculture.

Inasmuch as the time is rapidly approaching when the canners must begin contracting acreage for the 1932 canning crops, and under the regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture by authority of the perishable agricultural commodities act canners are requested to take out their license prior to contracting acreage, it seems extremely desirable that prompt action on the amendment be had by Congress.

Predicating their thought upon the unofficial approval given the amendment by the department, the canning associations of the State have suggested to the canners that they defer applying for the Federal license pending the enactment of the proposed amendment.

The suggested amendment does not in any way weaken the act, and as canners generally for several seasons past have been in more or less of an embarrassed condition because of the unsatisfactory situation surrounding their business, I feel that any assistance in lessening the burden of operation that can be contributed by the Government should be promptly extended.

I bespeak for Senate 2827 the favorable consideration of the Senate, and it would be very pleasing to me if it could be passed.

Mr. KING. It liberalizes the present law?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It does.

Mr. KING. Where do they find the constitutional right or authority to require the canners of the Senator's State to take out licenses to buy raw material in that State for canned goods shipped across the line into Washington?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I do not think they have it, but that has been the interpretation placed upon the act, and this is to clarify it, and for that purpose only.

Mr. KING. I think it is perfectly absurd that such authority should be exercised, and I wish the Senator had gone further and provided that no license whatever should be required, and that the Federal Government should have no jurisdiction over the transaction.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It goes a part of the distance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 290) to establish a memorial to Theodore Roosevelt in the National Capital, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, to strike out the words "That no structure, road, or other artificial treatment shall be built on said island without the approval of the said Roosevelt Memorial Association or such advisory board as the latter may designate to act for it" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "That no general plan for the development of the island be adopted without the approval of the Roosevelt Memorial Association; and that, so long as this association remains in existence, no development, inconsistent with this plan, be executed without the association's consent," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept and receive as a gift from the Roosevelt Memorial Association (Inc.), for and in behalf of the United States, the island in the Potomac River heretofore variously known as Barbadoes, Analostan, and Masons Island, together with accretions thereto; and that, upon acceptance of this gift of land, the said island shall hereafter be known as Roosevelt Island and shall be maintained and administered by the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital as a natural park for the recreation and enjoyment of the public: Provided, That no general plan for the development of the island be adopted without the approval of the Roosevelt Memorial Association; and that, so long as this association remains in existence, no development, inconsistent with this plan, be executed without the association's consent.

SEC. 2. That the director is hereby authorized to provide suitable means of access to and upon the said Roosevelt Island as appropriations are made available from time to time and subject to the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission; and that the appropriations needed for such construction and annually for the care, maintenance, and improvement of the said lands and improvements, are hereby authorized to be made from any funds not otherwise appropriated from the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks be, and he is hereby, further authorized and directed to permit the Roosevelt Memorial Association (Inc.) to erect on said Roosevelt Island such monument or memorial and related structures as may be recommended by it and approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I be permitted to say, in regard to section 3, that it gives the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital the authorization to permit the Roosevelt Memorial Association to erect on Roosevelt Island such monument or memorial and related structures as may be recommended by it and approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

My reason for not objecting to this is that I understand no memorial will be erected which will be in the nature of an obstacle to air navigation, to airplanes making a landing at the Washington Airport on the south side of the Potomac River. Had it been the intention of the association to erect a very high memorial, something in the nature of the Washington Monument, or a similar structure, it would have been in the nature of an obstacle to air navigation.

I am making this statement for the sake of the record in order that there may be no misunderstanding in the future as to the nature of the memorial. I believe it is not intended to erect anything that will be in the nature of an obstacle to air navigation.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire whether this measure has been approved by the District Commissioners?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the matter has not been submitted to the District Commissioners, but the Park and Planning Commission has had in mind for a long while the purchase of the island referred to, and they offered a handsome sum for it, but the company which owned it asked about three times what the commission thought it was worth. Then the Government proceeded with condemnation proceedings, in order to take the island over, so as to insure that it would be a part of the park system of the capital at some time.

When that step was taken, the company which owned the island opened up negotiations with the Roosevelt Memorial Association, and that association purchased the island for $364,000, and proceeded to give it to the Government as a part of the park plan.

The only point of difficulty was that they did not want to to leave the matter open so that the Government might do anything there in the nature of what the Senator from Connecticut has mentioned. I think there is no obstacle whatever, because it is a gift to the Government of this valuable island, and it is hoped that it can be kept in a wild state. Therefore I think we ought to accept it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION TO HELEN H. TAFT

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in order to do justice which has long been delayed, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the lateness of the hour, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 349, Senate bill 1230, granting a pension to Helen H. Taft, the widow of President Taft, who, due to an oversight, has not yet received the pension which has always been granted to the widows of deceased Presidents.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen H. Taft, widow of William Howard Taft, late President of the United States, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $5,000 per year from and after the passage of this act.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL MONUMENT

The bill (S. 3506) authorizing the selection of a site and the erection thereon of a suitable monument indicating the historical significance of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is authorized and directed to select, with the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, a suitable site within the public grounds of the United States in the District of Columbia (other than the grounds of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House) for a monument to indicate the historical significance of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and to grant permission to the General Society, Sons of the Revolution, to erect, through their duly authorized representatives, an appropriate monument on such site as a gift to the people of the United States. The design of such monument shall be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts, and such monument shall be erected under the supervision of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, but the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate, pursuant to its order, the agricultural appropriation bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Bankhead	Davis	King	Smith
Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Smoot
Barkley	Dill	Lewis	Stelwer
Bingham	Fess	Logan	Stephens
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bratton	Glass	Morrison	Trammell
Brookhart	Glenn	Moses	Tydings
Broussard	Goldsborough	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Gore	Norbeck	Wagner
Bulow	Hale	Norris	Walcott
Byrnes	Harrison	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hatfield	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hayden	Patterson	Waterman
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ark	White
Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is my purpose very briefly to outline the provisions carrying the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture activities for the year, particularly with reference to the amount of the current appropriations and the changes made by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

The current appropriations are, in round numbers, $235,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932. The bill as it passed the House carried $175,000,000, in round numbers, a reduction of $60,000,000 over the current year. I might observe in passing that probably in no bill in the history of the Congress has there been such a real paring as in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1933. I might well speak in commendatory terms of the House in sending to us a bill with such a splendid reduction.

The estimate of the Bureau of the Budget was $186,000,000. The House bill is nearly $11,000,000 less than the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget. When the bill reached the Senate Appropriations Committee more than a week was given to an intensive study of the measure. I may say that there was present at all times a quorum of the Senate Committee on appropriations and much interest was manifested in the various projects and items. The Senate committee added to the bill three items. One was for the regular departmental activities in the sum of $330,000. That is the amount that was added by the Senate committee to offset a reduction in excess of $10,000,000 as provided by the House of Representatives for the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

The bill also includes an item of $1,000,000 for the participation of the United States Government in the Chicago World's Fair of 1933. This was in accordance with the previous authorization of the Senate and House. The amount was reduced from $1,750,000 to $1,000,000. It has received the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and is properly in the bill.

The other item is for $1,450,000, which the Senate Appropriations Committee incorporated in the bill for anticipated grasshopper control. That item also received the approval of the Bureau of the Budget.

Consequently, the bill as reported to the Senate by its Committee on Appropriations carries for the fiscal year 1933 $57,000,000 less than the current appropriation. It is under the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget by a little more than $10,000,000. The Senate Committee on Appropriations has added $2,700,000, composed of the three items which I have just explained.

If the various other items in the bill call for any discussion, I should be glad to explain them as we reach them. At the present time I shall be content with the statement I have made and to ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if it is agreeable to him, in view of the fact that there are no objections to the amendment relating to the world-fair item added by the Senate, to take up that amendment at once?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very happy to accommodate the Senator from Illinois. The item to which he refers has received the sanction of the Bureau of the Budget and has received the approval of the Committee on Appropriations and is entirely in order. I am willing to accommodate the Senator from Illinois by acceding to his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will report the amendment to which the Senator from Illinois has referred.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 93, after line 16, the Committee on Appropriations proposes to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act providing for the participation of the United States in A Century of Progress (the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration), to be held at Chicago, Ill., in 1933, authorizing an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1932, and for each and every object thereof and within the limits of cost specified therein, to be immediately available and to remain available until June 30, 1934, $1,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oregon for allowing me this space of time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will proceed to read the bill and report the first amendment under the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Oregon.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 9, line 11, to employ the use of larger type in the heading "Library, Department of Agriculture."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Office of Experiment Stations," on page 13, line 3, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$155,000" and insert "$153,000," so as to read:

Total, Office of Experiment Stations, $4,668,294, of which amount not to exceed $153,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Weather Bureau, salaries and general expenses," on page 19, line 4, before the word "For," to insert "General administrative expenses," so as to read:

General administrative expenses: For necessary expenses for general administrative purposes, including the salary of chief of bureau and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $136,180.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 16, before the word "of," to strike out "$2,483,218" and insert "$2,513,718," so as to read:

General weather service and research: For necessary expenses incident to collecting and disseminating meteorological, climatological, and marine information, and for investigations in meteorology, climatology, seismology, evaporation, and aerology in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including $4,650 for investigations of the relationship of weather conditions to forest fires, under section 6 of the act approved May 22, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, sec. 581e), $2,513,718, of which not to exceed $800 may be expended for the contribution of the United States to the cost of the office of the secretariat of the International Meteorological Committee, and not to exceed $10,000 may be expended for the maintenance of a printing office in the city of Washington for the printing of weather maps, bulletins, circulars, forms, and other publications.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, at the end of line 7, to strike out "$1,457,440" and insert "$1,465,440," so as to read:

Aerology: For the maintenance of stations, for observing, measuring, and investigating atmospheric phenomena, including salaries and other expenses, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $1,465,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Animal Industry, salaries, and general expenses," on page 25, line 17, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$673,400" and insert "$674,600," so as to read:

Animal husbandry: For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations and other agencies, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $674,600, together with $4,600 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1931, for the purchase of additional land for poultry investigations at Glendale, Ariz., and including $12,500 for livestock experiments and demonstrations at Big Springs, and/or elsewhere in Texas, to be available only when the State of Texas, or other cooperating agency in Texas shall have appropriated an equal amount or, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall have furnished its equivalent in value in cooperation for the same purpose during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 10, to change the total appropriation for salaries and expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, from $9,677,562 to $9,678,762.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 4, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry from $12,282,422 to $12,283,622.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Plant Industry," on page 33, line 22, after the word "production," to strike out "$550,785" and insert "$554,485," so as to read:

Cereal crops and diseases: For the investigation and improvement of cereals, including corn, and methods of cereal production and for the study and control of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broomcorn and methods of broomcorn production, $554,485.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, at the end of line 24, to strike out "$37,720" and insert "$57,720," so as to read:

Drug and related plants: For the investigation, testing, and improvement of plants yielding drugs, spices, poisons, oils, and related products and by-products, $57,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 3, after the word "conditions," to strike out "$242,260" and insert "$262,040," so as to read:

Dry-land agriculture: For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions, $262,040: Provided, That the limitations in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the establishment of any new field station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 9, after the word "National," to strike out "Aboretum" and insert "Arboretum," so as to read:

National Arboretum: For the maintenance of the National Arboretum established under the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a National Arboretum, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 20, secs. 191–194), including the erection of buildings, salaries in the city of Washington and elsewhere, traveling expenses of employees and advisory council, and other necessary expenses, $5,000, of which such amounts as may be necessary may be expended by contract or otherwise for the services of consulting landscape architects without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, or civil-service rules.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 7, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Industry from $5,333,138 to $5,381,618.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "National forest administration," on page 43, line 13, after the name "South Dakota," to strike out "$1,622,610" and insert "$1,640,110," so as to read:

In national forest region 1, Montana, Washington, Idaho, and South Dakota, $1,640,110.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 21, after the name "Oklahoma," to strike out "$695,548" and insert "$702,610," so as to read:

In national forest region 2, Colorado, Wyoming, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Oklahoma, $702,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 2, to strike out "$679,717" and insert "$687,480," so as to read:

In national forest region 3, Arizona and New Mexico, $687,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 4, after the name "Colorado," to strike out "$887,490" and insert "$896,800," so as to read:

In national forest region 4, Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, Arizona, and Colorado, $896,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether any of the provisions which have thus far been considered are embraced, either directly or indirectly, in the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who is necessarily absent on account of a death in his family? I understood that he had obtained consent to offer some 30 or 40 amendments. If the amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Tennessee relate to some amendments which have been disposed of, I should be glad to ask to reconsider the vote by which they were agreed to, in order that the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee may be appropriately considered.

Mr. McNARY. On account of the multiplicity of the amendments I am not conversant with each one, but I think the amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Tennessee go to major projects, and probably will form the basis of oral arguments by the Senator when he returns to the Chamber. However, if any of the amendments which have been offered by the Senator from Tennessee are affected in any way by those already disposed of, I shall ask for a reconsideration of those items.

Mr. KING. Not being a member of the committee, I am not familiar with the amendments proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, but I know that they were offered here, and I did not want his rights to be jeopardized.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 44, line 6, after the name "Nevada," to strike out "$1,195,193" and insert "$1,208,130," so as to read:

In national forest region 5, California and Nevada, $1,208,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 8, after the name "California," to strike out "$1,211,023" and insert "$1,224,350," so as to read:

In national forest region 6, Washington, Oregon, and California, $1,224,350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 13, after the name "Vermont," to strike out "$542,190" and insert "547,690," so as to read:

In national forest region 7, Arkansas, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, New Hampshire, Maine, Porto Rico, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Vermont, $547,690.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 14, after the name "Alaska," to strike out "$132,579" and insert "$133,990," so as to read:

In national forest region 8, Alaska, $133,990.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 17, after the name "Wisconsin," to strike out "$126,644" and insert "$128,334," so as to read:

In national forest region 9, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, $128,334.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 20, after the words "national forests," to strike out "$7,092,994" and insert "$7,169,494," so as to read:

In all, for the use, maintenance, improvement, protection, and general administration of the national forests, $7,169,494.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 19, after the word "planting," to strike out "$154,200" and insert "$160,000," so as to read:

Planting on national forests: For the establishment and maintenance of forest-tree nurseries, the collection or purchase of tree seed, cones, and nursery stock, and seeding and tree planting within national forests; for additional protection, care, and improvement of plantations or young growth; and for experiments and investigations necessary for seeding and tree planting, $160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 5, after the words "national forests," to strike out "$993,440" and insert "$1,045,840," so as to read:

Improvement of the national forests: For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $1,045,840, of which amount $100,000 is reserved for expenditure for the Angeles, Cleveland, Santa Barbara, and San Bernardino National Forests in southern California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 1, after the name "Minnesota," to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That not less than $500,000 of this appropriation shall be available only for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails during the fire-hazard season.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Forest Research," on page 49, line 8, to change the appropriation for salaries and expenses in the Forest Service from $10,422,014 to $10,556,714.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Acquisition of additional forest lands," on page 51, line 9, before the word "as," to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$245,940," so as to read:

For the acquisition of additional lands under the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 513–519), as amended by the act of June 7, 1924 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 564–570), $245,940, as authorized by the act of June 2, 1930 (46 Stat. 491), of which amount not to exceed $35,000 may be expended for departmental personal services and supplies and equipment in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 14, to change the total appropriation for the Forest Service from "$12,313,554" to "$12,494,194."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading of "Bureau of Entomology," on page 57, line 12, before the word "Title," to strike out "IV" and insert "V," so as to read:

For household insects and insects affecting stored products, including $4,900 for insects affecting forest products under section 4 of the act approved May 22, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, sec. 581c), $147,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Biological Survey, salaries and general expenses," on page 59, line 20, before the word "for," to strike out "$24,300" and insert "$20,000," so as to read:

For biological investigations, including the relations, habits, geographic distribution, and migration of animals and plants, and the preparation of maps of the life zones, and including $20,000 for investigations of the relations of wild animal life to forests, under section 5 of the act approved May 22, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, sec. 581d), and for investigations, experiments, and demonstrations in the establishment, improvement, and increase of the reindeer industry and of musk oxen and mountain sheep in Alaska, including the erection of necessary buildings and other structures, $102,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Upper Mississippi River Refuge," on page 61, line 8, before the word "which," to strike out "$34,400" and insert "$34,033," and in line 13, after the word "Act," to strike out "$46,178" and insert "$45,445," so as to read:

For the acquisition of areas of land or land and water pursuant to the act entitled "An act to establish the Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge," approved June 7, 1924 (U. S. C., title 16, secs. 721–731), as amended, and for all necessary expenses incident thereto, including the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $34,033, which shall be available until expended, being part of the sum of $1,500,000 authorized to be appropriated for such purpose by section 10 of said act; and for all necessary expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture authorized by section 9 of said act, $45,445; in all, $79,478.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Federal-aid highway system," on page 65, line 13, after the parenthesis, to strike out the colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any State on account of any project on which convict labor shall be directly employed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the House text by inserting in line 16, after the word "employed," a comma and the words "except this provision shall not apply to convict labor performed by convicts on parole or probation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 65, line 16, after the word "employed" and before the period, it is proposed to insert "except this provision shall not apply to convict labor performed by convicts on parole or probation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted will be reconsidered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Schall
Austin	Cutting	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bailey	Dale	Keyes	Shipstead
Bankhead	Davis	King	Smith
Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Smoot
Barkley	Dill	Lewis	Steiwer
Bingham	Fess	Logan	Stephens
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Blaine	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	George	Metcalf	Townsend
Bratton	Glass	Morrison	Trammell
Brookhart	Glenn	Moses	Tydings
Broussard	Goldsborough	Neely	Vandenberg
Bulkley	Gore	Norbeck	Wagner
Bulow	Hale	Norris	Walcott
Byrnes	Harrison	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Capper	Hatfield	Oddie	Walsh, Mont.
Carey	Hayden	Patterson	Waterman
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.	White
Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The situation is that the committee reported in favor of striking out a portion of the House text beginning with the word "Provided." Now, do I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin offers his amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment which strikes out certain language? The Senator's amendment retains the House language and adds to it. Is that a substitute for the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, a Senator may propose an amendment to the portion to be stricken out by an amendment of the committee. That is what the Chair understands the situation to be. The Chair has not read the amendment as yet.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether the amendment of the Senator is to add to the committee amendment or to the House text.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I can clarify the situation. The amendment of the committee seeks to strike out new language which was written in the bill on the floor of the House. When it reached the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, after very studious consideration and by a divided vote, the Senate committee decided to strike out the House language. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment which is applicable in the event of a restoration of the House text.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; as a substitute for the committee amendment, as I understand.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that the Senate has adopted the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announced that by unanimous consent the action agreeing to the amendment would be reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. Very well; I was going to ask that that be done, because I think it is the intention of some Members of the Senate to discuss the provisions originally inserted by the House. Then after the disposition of that question it may be ascertained whether the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is not an amendment to perfect the House text in order before a motion to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, and, upon that basis, the Chair held that the amendment was in order. The Chair was unable to secure a copy of the amendment, but he was advised by the clerk at the desk that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is to perfect the House text, and, if so, the amendment is in order. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin shall be agreed to, the question will then recur on striking out the proviso as amended.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 65, line 13, the committee proposes to strike out the colon and the following words:

Provided, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any State on account of any project on which public labor shall be directly employed.

At this point, after the word "employed" and before the period, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to insert a comma and the following words:

Except this provision shall not apply to convict labor performed by convicts on parole or probation.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the amendment now in question relates to the use of money appropriated in this bill for Federal-aid highway construction. For the first time, so far as I know, language of this kind is written into an appropriation to preclude the use of any of the money in connection with the construction of any project on which convict labor is directly employed.

Much has been said, from time to time, regarding the use of convict labor. It is a principle not new, but one of considerable duration. The question has two aspects. Of course, in its consideration, no one would lose sight of the humanitarian phase of this matter from the standpoint of convicts; but I doubt whether this is the time to employ convict labor on highway construction financed by funds from the public Treasury when we have eight or ten million men out of employment. Therefore I am in sympathy with the House language, and disagree with the action of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, of which I am a member.

Mr. President, I do not believe we can afford to finance public-road construction with public funds, where convicts are used, those who have transgressed the law, while 8,000,000 law-abiding citizens, men who have respected the laws of their country, many of whom have families depending upon them for support, are out of employment and are walking hither, yon, and elsewhere, vainly searching for means through which they can support themselves and those dependent upon them. Is it tenable, with that number of law-abiding citizens—and let me stress that expression—law-abiding citizens, who have supported the country both in time of peace and in time of war, that they shall search vainly for gainful employment while public funds are taken from the Treasury and road construction is financed through the use of convict labor?

Under other circumstances and during normal times, perhaps that consideration would not be so overwhelming; but it seems that this is an inopportune time to use public money for financing development in this country through the use of convict labor when we have not hundreds, not thousands, but millions of patriotic citizens who need the work, who are able to perform it, who are anxious to do so.

I know it will be said, and with much force, that this is a matter which should be remitted to the States, and that we should let each State determine it as a domestic policy. This proviso, however, is confined to the use of the money appropriated in the act; nor does it deal with a State as a single entity—that is to say, that the State shall receive its proportion or none at all. It is confined to particular projects. A State may have half a dozen projects, and if it wants to use convict labor upon three of them it can not use any of this money upon those three; but, on the other three, where convict labor is not employed, the State may receive its quota and use it.

So that it is not altogether and essentially a question to be remitted to each State for its determination as a domestic matter. It is not one that falls within the ordinary category of State rights. Here we are appropriating money of taxpayers who are interested in the unemployment problem, who can not dissociate themselves from it. By the limitation inserted in the bill it is simply provided that so far as Project A in a certain State is concerned, if the State wants to employ convict labor upon it, the State must forego the use of Federal funds. If the State desires Federal funds, it must forego the use of convict labor upon that particular project. It may use convict labor elsewhere and draw its full quota of Federal funds under this act and apply them to those projects.

Mr. President, under these circumstances, in these times, with these conditions confronting us, it seems that government and society can afford to finance the safekeeping of its prisoners with public funds, and use public funds to pay law-abiding, peaceful citizens, who have respected the laws of their country, who have supported it upon every call and in every circumstance. I, for one, am unwilling during these abnormal times, during these extraordinary conditions, to allow any part of this $100,000,000 to be used in paying for highway construction where forced labor—that is to say, convict labor, prison labor—is used, while citizens and breadwinners and home supporters are out of employment, and are helpless, and can not support themselves and those dependent upon them.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I care nothing particularly about this amendment. I do not think it will interfere at all in my State, so far as that is concerned; but I think there is a great ado about nothing in the amendment. I want to ask the Senator what he is going to do with these convicts. Is he going to put them in a factory and bring them into competition with skilled labor in factories? Is he going to put them into farming and bring them into competition with the farmers of the country? Or is he going to have them remain idle in some prison? What is the Senator going to do with them?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I would let each State determine that matter for itself. We are dealing here with Federal funds and the use of them. We are not transgressing upon any State, except to say that so far as the use of these particular funds is concerned, they can not be devoted to the payment of road work where convict labor is used. Let each State determine for itself what it will do with its prisoners.

A State may carry on a program of highway construction with convict labor, but it can not pay for it out of this money. It may segregate its program into two parts, and finance the part where convict labor is used otherwise than with this money, and at the same time use its part of this money for that part of its highway program where convict labor is not used.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BRATTON. I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to inquire of the Senator if he is opposed to the employment of prisoners who are on parole or probation?

Mr. BRATTON. No; I am not, Mr. President. I would not place a single handicap upon a prisoner who has earned his parole or probation, and is in a sense free. I favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. I think it is wholesome, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit a further interruption, there is the other angle as well—that a contractor may never know who among his employees are men who may be on probation or parole, without making unnecessary and extraordinary investigations.

Mr. BRATTON. Yes; that is a very important consideration, and is fully taken care of by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRATTON. I do.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to inquire whether the Senator favors this as a continuing policy or merely as an emergency policy.

Mr. BRATTON. It is an emergency policy, and for the time being I am confining myself to that.

Mr. DICKINSON. If it is once included in the bill and becomes a requirement so far as Federal appropriations for roads are concerned, does the Senator think it will ever be removed?

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, yes. The Senator certainly does not think that the enactment of legislation in these circumstances would compel Congress to continue it in the future. We are passing emergency legislation almost every day that certainly no one would consider under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. DICKINSON. But the chances of removing legislation of this kind from an appropriation bill, in my experience, are very remote if it is once included in the bill. In view of the fact that we do not favor this as a permanent policy, I am wondering if the Senator does not think it would be better for the States themselves to meet these conditions now, rather than to have this put in, with the probability that it will be a permanent policy so far as Federal road appropriations are concerned.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, my acquaintance and association with the Senator from Iowa convince me that he would prefer to do justice in existing circumstances, and let the future take care of itself. We are dealing now with a situation involving 10,000,000 unemployed men in this country. They have a right to live. They have a right to earn sufficient to support themselves and their families; and to me it is no justification for this amendment to say that once we adopt it we will never get rid of it. Let us do what the situation requires now, and then do the right thing when conditions change, when we have a different situation.

No, Mr. President; the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa does not appeal to me. I think Congress will have the ability and the courage and the foresight to change this legislation when changed conditions justify it. These emergent circumstances evoked this unusual provision in the bill. I have no doubt that the body at the opposite end of the Capitol was moved to insert this provision on account of existing conditions; and I have no doubt that this body, as well as that body, can rid itself of this provision whenever, in the judgment of Congress, it should be done.

But, Mr. President, I am not discussing that matter now. I am discussing conditions to-day, in the year 1932, the circumstances confronting 10,000,000 citizens of this country.

Mr. President, I deem it is unwise, unsound, and unjust to use public funds to pay for development carried forward by convict labor as long as we have 10,000,000 sovereign, free citizens of this country anxious to do the work, eager to perform the service, desirous to support themselves and their families in that way.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. In response to the suggestion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], does not the Senator from New Mexico believe it would be better even to keep these prisoners idle, locked up, than to have decent, free citizens walking the streets half fed and half clothed?

Mr. BRATTON. Indeed I do.

Mr. COUZENS. Would it not be better to have that happen, if necessary, so that these free citizens may get the work for which this money is appropriated?

Mr. BRATTON. If that is the only alternative, I should say keep the prisoners locked up for the time being, employ free men on highway construction, and pay them with this money, instead of paying it to contractors and others using convict labor.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say. The situation is one with which each Member of this body is familiar.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment restricts this limitation to a given project.

Mr. BRATTON. It does.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If we drive convict labor from that particular project to another project in the State, we are bringing about a transfer of labor, but how do we give employment to any greater number of people? If the State sees fit to put the convicts on another project which receives no Federal aid, do they not go there and take the place of somebody who is laboring on the other project?

Mr. BRATTON. They do.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If they do that, how do we increase the facilities or opportunity to take care of unemployment?

Mr. BRATTON. They supplant free labor under those conditions, but that is an injustice which is done by the State and not by the Federal Government, and it is beyond the power of the Congress to deal with it. As far as Congress can go in this appropriation is to limit the use of this particular fund; and if the State sees fit to transfer convict labor from one project to another, and thereby supplant free labor on the latter project, that is a matter with which the Congress can not deal. It is an injustice which is beyond Congress. If, however, we are right in principle, namely, that convict labor should not be used when free men are idle, then as far as Congress can go is to say that no part of this money shall be used for projects on which convict labor is employed.

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. COUZENS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield further to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. My impression is that in reality what it is desired to accomplish and what is contemplated will not be accomplished. It may be a matter of theory; but, in reality, in the execution of road construction and the handling of convicts there would not be employment given to any more free people, but the result would be to drive them to take the places of free labor some place else, perhaps.

I say that the amendment amounts to nothing. It is a sentiment, and I believe in giving free labor employment every time that can be done in preference to convict labor. I am in favor of the objects of the amendment, but it will accomplish nothing. That is my position—that it will accomplish absolutely nothing toward taking care of unemployment or giving more free laboring people jobs.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator says he is in favor of the principle involved. Then let us write the principle into the bill and hope for its operation on the widest scale possible.

The provision might have been made broad enough, perhaps it should have been made broad enough, to apply to a State as an entirety; that is to say, that none of the money should be paid to a State in which convict labor is employed in Federal-aid highway construction. But the language does not go that far. It is confined to a particular project, and provides that none of the money should be paid to a State on account of any project on which convict labor shall be directly employed. With that limitation I have no complaint.

In response to the suggestion just made by the Senator from Florida, in my opinion this provision will operate in this wise: A State will forego the use of convict labor in order to enjoy its allocation of this particular fund. It will make other use of its convicts or other disposition of them.

I think the provision is sound and should be adopted in view of existing circumstances. Accordingly, I hope very much that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be disagreed to and the House text retained in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the action of the House in putting this language into the bill, which the Committee on Appropriations moves to strike out, is another direct attempt on the part of Congress to dictate a policy to the States. As a matter of fact, it attempts to dictate a policy to only four States. The committee was informed that only four States in the Union now employ convict labor on the roads. My own State does not so employ its convicts. They are now employed within the confines of the penal and reformatory institutions. So it is not a matter which concerns us in Connecticut one way or the other. It will not affect the amount of Federal aid we will receive for roads one way or the other.

Mr. President, I do seriously object to Congress breaking down the rights of the States saying how their citizens shall behave and shall employ themselves, and how they shall take care of their own convicts. There are only four States of the Union which do not agree with the policy proposed by the Senator from New Mexico. We heard in the committee the very emphatic statement made by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] who, unfortunately, is not able to be present this afternoon, when he said that it would cause the very greatest embarrassment to the State of Virginia if this provision suggested by the House were adopted. I had hoped that this measure might go over until such time as the Senator from Virginia might be here to present his views. But in his absence, while not wishing to speak for the State of Virginia at all, I do want to raise my voice against an effort on the part of the States of the Union in Congress assembled to inflict their judgment on four States which follow a different policy.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico talks about 10,000,000 people being out of work. I do not know where he gets his figures. I have been endeavoring for some time to find out how many unemployed there are in this country.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BRATTON. What is the Senator's judgment about it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am about to state it.

Mr. BRATTON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought the Senator might tell us where he got his figures of 10,000,000.

Mr. BRATTON. It has been stated throughout the press and by every reputable authority I know anything about. The Senator from Connecticut is the only one, so far as I know, who disputes the figures.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, Mr. President. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he remembers that Congress passed an act some years ago, which took effect four years after its passage, whereby interstate commerce in goods manufactured by convict labor was prohibited where a State itself did not desire it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was about to refer to that. I am glad the Senator reminded me of it, but I had intended to speak about it.

So far as I have been able to find—and I have been making inquiry—the American Federation of Labor believes that there are about 8,000,000 people out of work, but when asked to furnish a statement as to the number in each State and as to how they arrived at those figures they said they were unable to do so.

The Department of Labor, so far as I know, has not given out any official figures, but I have seen in the papers an estimate which I thought came from the Department of Labor, that there were about 6,000,000 out of work.

The Census Bureau, in taking the census a year ago last April, discovered some two and a half million people able to work, out of work and unable to obtain work.

However, I do not care to enter into a discussion of that. There is no question about an enormous number of people being out of work. But the amendment offered by the Appropriations Committee is not going to benefit any of those people out of work except in the four States concerned, and, after all, it is generally agreed that taking care of citizens and their welfare is a matter for the States and communities, rather than for the Central Government, unless a State is entirely unable, due to some great catastrophe, to do that. It is not going to benefit a large number of people but a very small number of people. Furthermore, it is going to work hardship to a very considerable number of citizens who have, from one cause or another, come into misfortune.

The Senator from Michigan refers to a bill which we passed a few years ago in regard to making it impossible for a State to manufacture and to send to another State articles manufactured by prison labor when the other State had laws which prevented it from employing its own convicts in the making of goods to be sold. That bill protected the rights of the States and did not interfere with them. It protected the right of a State to deny its convicts the right to make goods for sale by providing that no State which granted such permission could bring articles into a State to be sold in competition with the articles made by free labor in the State.

At the time that bill was passed it was repeatedly stated in the debate that any State might employ its citizens on any project it chose to employ them on, either on roads or in the manufacture of automobile tags or in the manufacturing of clothing and shoes to be used by persons in the penal or other public-welfare institutions in the State. There was no one at that time who proposed that it was good public policy to require prisoners to sit with their arms folded, and I submit that unless we revert to the medieval torture of the treadmill, there is almost nothing a prisoner can do which does not compete with free labor in a State.

I submit furthermore, Mr. President, that it is the duty of the legislature and the government of each State to determine how its citizens shall be employed, whether indoors in the manufacture of the things which have just been referred to, or outdoors on the roads, and that for us to attempt to browbeat or bribe or dictate to the States as to how they shall treat the convicts in their own borders, who are not competing with free labor in other States, not affecting the laws of other States at all, is going directly contrary to the principles upon which this Government was founded, namely, permitting the States to carry on their own affairs in their own way, without dictation from the Federal Government.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the committee amendment will not be agreed to. When Congress went on record disapproving convict labor as being in competition with free labor, in my opinion it clearly declared, as far as it was able under the Constitution to do so, that it did not approve of convict labor being in competition with free labor.

It is obvious that Congress can not go further than is proposed in this provision made by the House. Whether or not any actual benefit accrues, the question which has been raised by the Senator from Florida is not the point. The point is that if Congress agrees that the money which it appropriates shall not be used to employ convict labor while free labor walks the streets, that is a policy for Congress to declare without regard to what the States may think about it.

The Senator from Connecticut talks about the treadmill which the prisoners might have to contend with. The Senator must take into account that those men who are in prison are assumedly there on account of their own voluntary acts. We all regret the fact that they have to be idle for long periods of time. But do we regret that more than we regret the fact that millions of our citizens have to walk treadmills from factory to factory, looking for employment, while we stand here and appropriate money to feed the unemployed, to facilitate road building, to give more work, while some of the States, whether it is four or a dozen is immaterial, take men out of the prisons to do work while free men walk the streets?

I can not conceive of Congress going on record as approving any philosophy such as that. We have made that sort of gestures in the way of legislation, which many of us have said were for psychological effect, such as the two financial acts which have recently been passed. It is common knowledge that they would have a psychological value.

Whether there are any concrete results to be gained from this amendment or not is not the issue. The issue is whether Congress intends for the public and the States to believe that it intends to appropriate money to aid the unemployed, to create more work, and, at the same time, allow it to be used to take prisoners out of prison to do the work of free labor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I favor the adoption of the committee amendment. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut on this subject, that it is a process of dictating to the States what they shall do with respect to their people, although that may not be the intention and the purpose.

I do not think it an unworthy feeling or sentiment or desire that we should show some interest in the prisons themselves. Why house them and confine them in close quarters and in unsanitary conditions because they are prisoners? If they can be healthier, if they can better themselves, if it will be better for society to have them in camps along the highways, where they will have the open air and the sunshine, why not give them that opportunity? Simply because they are prisoners they should not be treated without regard to humane conditions. So much for that.

I believe in the truth of the statement in the communication which I have, that the adoption of the amendment—that is, the House amendment—will not make possible the employment of one additional free laborer or provide a single additional person with bread and shelter. The argument for that is stated in the communication I have in my hand, and I will content myself with asking to have it read by the clerk at the desk. It seems to me that is all that need be said on the subject.

For the good of society, for the betterment of conditions with respect to State rights, I think this amendment offered by the committee ought to be agreed to, and I hope it will be agreed to. It is not right for the Federal Government to undertake to dictate conditions to the States.

Florida, for instance, would lose a very considerable portion of the Federal-aid fund if the provision remains in the bill, but I am not looking at it from that standpoint. It is not on selfish grounds at all, but it is because I believe that such a provision in an appropriation bill is unsound, unwise, and unjustified.

I ask to have the letter read as a basis for my reasons for the position which I take on this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PENAL INFORMATION (INC.),
New York, N. Y., February 2, 1932.

The Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Permit me to call to your attention a clause which was added to the agricultural appropriation bill and which provides that none of the money appropriated for construction of public roads should be used on any project on which convict labor is directly employed. The amendment will be found on page 66, line 18, of H. R. 7912, and reads as follows:

"Provided, That none of the money herein appropriated shall be paid to any State on account of any project on which convict labor shall be directly employed."

The foregoing language will have far-reaching effects on the penal program of a great many States. It will necessitate a complete change of policy for almost all of the Southern States and will greatly hamper the States of New Jersey, New York, Michigan, California, and I think your own State, in working out an intelligent and helpful solution to the baffling problem of convict labor. It spells disaster for the prison-camp program of a large portion of the States. It will mean that those States which have relieved the overcrowded, insanitary, and deplorable conditions in their prisons and jails through the establishment of road camps, will have to abandon them and return the inmates to the State institutions. The least that this policy can cause will be added expense, further congestion, and an increase in prison unemployment. Quite conceivably it may result in further prison riots, fire, and bloodshed.

The adoption of the amendment will not make possible the employment of one additional free laborer or provide a single additional person with bread or shelter. It is specious to argue that the utilization of convict labor throws a man who has not been convicted of crime out of employment. The use of convict labor on road construction simply changes the type of employment. Instead of spending the funds available for highway construction to laborers on the road, they are expended for raw materials which in the last analysis largely represent labor costs. In other words, by the use of the prison labor a greater amount of road construction will be done with the same funds.

The States and counties have a definitely limited amount of money available for carrying out their government functions. Since it is a paramount duty of the government to preserve law and order, they must provide first of all for their law-enforcement activities, including the housing, feeding, and guarding of the lawbreakers. Money expended for maintaining prisoners in idleness is not available for road construction or other public improvements. If a prisoner is maintained in idleness, the economic value of his labor is irretrievably lost and he becomes a charge upon the whole people.

There is ample evidence to support the assertion that unless some of the prisoners are employed on the roads they will remain in idleness. The most equitable method which has ever been suggested for the convict-labor problem is to diversify as far as possible the kinds of work on which he is employed and to apply his labor in producing articles and supplies for the use of the State. Road construction can not and should not be eliminated as this amendment seeks to do.

It is puerile economics to say that taking a man out of circulation and maintaining him in idleness at the expense of the whole people can or will bring prosperity.

The amendment was placed in the bill without notice to those interested and will, I venture to say, escape the attention of those most vitally affected until it is too late. Here again the Federal Government is legislating for all of the country. This simple amendment will have a controlling effect upon the prison-labor program of all of the States. It is doubtful wisdom for the Congress to attempt to control the penal policy of the several States in this manner. It is, in addition, decidedly unfair to place a "rider" of fundamental importance upon an appropriation bill. Those who are behind the amendment are not interested in unemployment; they are not interested in social welfare. They are concerned merely with profits. The general contractors are the sponsors of this amendment because they know that if convict labor is used on road construction the work will be supervised by the State and they will not be able to share in the tax funds.

I appeal to you to eliminate this amendment until you have had an opportunity to investigate the matter thoroughly. Let the proper committees of the Congress look into this matter and learn the facts. Our society, which is interested merely in improving conditions in the penal and correctional institutions of the country, will be glad to furnish you with available information on the subject.

Respectfully yours,

WM. B. COX, Secretary.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I received a copy of that letter. It is a rather specious letter, and I frankly responded to it in the same manner in which I have spoken here on the floor.

I do not desire to have the statement of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] stand as it appears in the RECORD that I do not care anything about the welfare of prison labor. I am conscientiously and actively interested in the proper treatment of prison labor; but when I am placed in the position of having to decide between the welfare of prison labor and the welfare of free labor, I do not think there can be any question about what my decision should be.

The question is whether we shall adopt a policy that while we are making appropriations for the aid of the unemployed we are to put the money into a plan to keep at work men who have committed crimes and who are imprisoned therefor. This is merely a temporary proposition. I would not approve of this provision in the bill during normal times. I think it is just a temporary situation such as the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] has explained. In view of that fact, it is not fair to compare the ordinary prison régime with existing conditions of unemployment.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I think there is a misunderstanding as to the effect this provision will have. It is assumed that some of the money that would go to pay free labor on the roads is to be used to pay wages to convicts. The fact is overlooked that the convict does not get pay for his labor. The convict is maintained at the expense of the State anyway. If the convicts were all kept within the walls of the penitentiary it would not give any perceptible amount of money with which to employ free labor. It would mean simply taking the convicts off of the road and locking them up. This provision does not take any money from free labor.

Besides that, I have little sympathy for the convict. I think many of the young boys who have become convicts in late years have done so as a result of the moving pictures, and the kind of education they get from that source makes racketeers out of boys who otherwise would be following some honest vocation. It is really a problem of bringing them out of a trance, and I think it is better to do it in this way than any other way that has been suggested.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that this really only affects certain States and works a very great hardship on the convicts in those States. For instance, in none of the New England States will any convict have the necessity of folding his hands and twirling his thumbs and sitting year after year without being employed at all and then being turned out a much worse man than when he went in, because those States have not within the memory of any of us used their convict labor on the roads. Therefore it will not hurt the convicts in the States who do not use the convict labor on the highways. Those convicts will be employed as usual. It does not benefit free labor in those States. It is applicable only in the States that have thought the best way of handling their convicts is to let them go out on the public roads and work.

The appropriations for Federal-aid roads generally go through the contractors in the States. The committee was informed that there is no case where a contractor employed prison labor in this work. The committee was informed, as stated by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] a few minutes ago, that when prison labor is used the amount of it is very small and the State benefits from it. There is more work all around. There are more roads being built. If the legislation is passed as the Senator from Michigan desires, what will happen is that in four or five States that have been accustomed to use their prisoners on road work the prisoners will have to suffer inactivity and be confined, instead of being used in a normal, healthy manner. They will not simply be eliminated. It is the object of most States to handle their convicts in such a way that if possible they may be turned back to the community better citizens that when they went in. If they are forced into idleness, as would be the case under the measure now before us, they will come out worse citizens than when they went in. After all, it is for the States to decide how to use their convicts and how they want them employed. This kind of legislation will merely cause suffering and hardship and make worse citizens in a few States, who will be unable to change completely their methods of handling convicts during an emergency.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I think it is proper that I should state briefly the situation as it appeared to the committee. As I stated earlier in the afternoon, the amendment was not a product of the House Committee on Appropriations but was inserted as an offering from a Representative from the State of New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. When the matter came to the attention of the Senate committee in the consideration of the bill, Representatives from the State of Virginia appeared before the committee, as did also Representatives from Indiana, and objected to the insertion of the House provision.

It is true, as stated, that this is the first time in any appropriation bill affecting highways, particularly the Federal-contribution highways, that inhibitory language of this kind has been employed. The committee was closely divided in the consideration of the matter, as it raises two very important propositions of philosophy bearing upon social and economic problems. The Representatives from some of the Southern States argued that it would affect greatly the highway construction if the convicts are not permitted to be employed; that their employment did not displace free labor, but it was only a question of expanding the highway improvement work. If that theory be true, and if this is in answer to those who want free labor, it would simply mean that in States like Virginia, Florida, Indiana, and other States which employ convict labor there would be no more free labor employed, but under the House provision there would be less expansion in the construction and improvement of highways.

Furthermore, it was argued by Members of the Senate who appeared before the committee that this is a matter of prerogative for the States. The State should determine its own methods with respect to the employment of men on the highways. I may say that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] very ably presented that phase of the case. The associated contractors, who have contracts for the construction of roads, also appeared in behalf of the proposition.

On the other hand, and probably this was the influencing motive that induced the committee to strike out the House language, is the question of what we shall do with the unfortunates confined in the prisons. That raises, of course, a social problem. It is true there is always some displacement, no more so in highway construction than if the convicts should manufacture automobile tags or furniture or cement in the prisons or operate in the vegetable fields and in the wheat fields, as is done in some States. There is always some displacement of labor. But it is inhuman to keep those prisoners without employment. Consequently it was thought by a majority of the committee—though I shall not disclose how the personnel of the committee voted—taking all matters into consideration, that the further expansion of the highway construction and the necessity for keeping these poor men employed, if we are to reform them in any way, that the House language should be stricken from the bill and that the States where the Federal highway money is employed in the expansion of the highway system should determine that factor for themselves.

It is true, and it is a very sound argument upon which the committee relied, that if it is left to the States they will have full control of the situation, and if there is unemployment in Michigan or Oregon or any other State, I am sure the State officials would not bring out convict labor in competition with free labor.

So when it comes to the proposition of striking this language from the bill, it was asserted that convicts will not displace free labor. It means it may be done if in the wisdom of the various States it is thought best to do so. That was the attitude assumed by the majority of the committee. The vote was a close one. The case, dealing as it does with a social problem and having its economic aspects, is a very difficult one.

The argument in favor of retaining the House text, Mr. President, has much to commend it in these particular times, the most distressing the country has ever experienced. It probably would not be harmful for the House language to remain in the bill; but, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] has so truthfully said, if restrictive language is used in the appropriation bill, it is, indeed, very difficult ever to extract it. So, taking the whole thing into consideration, after giving it very careful consideration, 12 members of the committee, as I recall, voted to strike out the House language. That, however, has nothing to do with the pending motion, which further restricts the House language.

I understand—and if I am mistaken, I desire the Vice President to correct me—that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has offered an amendment to the House text which the committee recommended be stricken from the bill. As I view it, and as the amendment was read at the desk, it seems to restrict the House language so that only prisoners who are on parole or probation can be employed upon the roads and not convicts generally. Is that the understanding of the Chair as to the purport of the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The purport of the amendment, as the Chair understands it, is not to apply the provision to prisoners on parole.

Mr. McNARY. That it shall not apply to prisoners on parole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That it shall not apply to prisoners on parole or probation.

Mr. McNARY. Or probation. I shall be content with simply stating as best I can and briefly the testimony that was before the Senate committee and the final vote in committee and the motives which actuated the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether or not he has any objection to the amendment excepting prisoners on parole and on probation?

Mr. McNARY. I have none whatsoever. I have no objection to whatsoever view the Senate may take with respect to the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator before he takes his seat if the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin shall be adopted, then the question will be on the amendment offered by the committee?

Mr. McNARY. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. Which would include the language of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin along with the House text?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. I think his argument is persuasive, and I have a great deal of sympathy with his contention, as he has illustrated it in his remarks. I can not quite see, however, the force of the contention that if the language of the House bill is not taken out, but remains in the bill, it will not insure in larger or appreciable numbers the employment of convicts, and will not thereby displace free labor. I can not quite see why by the employment of convict labor there is not excluded an equal amount of free labor. As I have said, I have sympathy with the Senator's position, but it seems to me there are other considerations to which we ought to give heed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was not presenting and it was not my intention, personally, to present my particular view. I was merely trying to set forth, briefly, the matters as presented to the committee. If the contribution of the Federal Government is made and is allocated to the States, certain amounts will go to particular States in which convicts are employed; it would simply mean that there would be an expansion of the work over and above that on which convicts were given employment. That is one of the arguments that was presented. Convicts would not receive any compensation, but free labor would receive the compensation to the extent that the expanded program was carried out.

Mr. FESS. I think I get that view. If the additional appropriation is authorized so that convict labor may be employed, as convicts are not paid, there would not be any disparagement of free labor.

Mr. McNARY. That was the presentation of those familiar with the situation where convicts are employed on the highways of the States where it has become the custom.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. In reply to what the Senator from Ohio asked the Senator from Oregon, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the Bureau of Public Roads, in testimony before the House and Senate, stated that out of every $1,000 spent only $141 is used to pay men employed directly on the construction job. In other words, less than 15 per cent out of every thousand dollars expended on such projects goes to the men actually at work on the job of constructing the roads.

If that amount be not paid to those men by reason of convict labor being employed, then it is available to be distributed among the large number of persons not directly employed on the roads, for the Department of Agriculture testifies that of the total amount between 85 and 90 per cent is eventually paid out as wages and salaries, a large part of which goes to men employed in the manufacture of cement and a large part to men employed by the transportation companies hauling materials and men driving trucks, and so forth. So the saving by using convict labor by any State which chooses to do so of $141 out of a thousand means that more free labor, engaged in cement manufacture, transportation, and other forms of labor, may be employed.

Mr. FESS. I see the position taken by both Senators. However, I am hardly convinced that preventing the employment of convict labor will not benefit to that degree free labor. Of course, if it would not apply anyway, it would not make any difference, but I think that convict labor is being employed to avoid the necessity of paying for building of the roads. It seems to me that that element is in it. For that reason I have been rather inclined to vote for the House provision, although I recognize the strength of the argument, which is very powerful, on behalf of the convicts. If I thought that the employment of convict labor would not be detrimental to the employment of free labor, there would not be a moment's hesitation on my part to vote with the committee.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to refer the Senator to the hearings before the Senate committee, at page 136, the testimony of Mr. Shirley, the State highway commissioner of Virginia. He says:

> On the question of interfering with free labor, I am sure neither this committee nor the gentlemen who put this provision in the bill have any conception or idea what an expense it will entail. In my State it costs about 65 cents a day to keep a convict in a penitentiary doing nothing. It costs 70 cents a day to keep him on the highways. Therefore, the interference with labor is 5 cents per day per convict. We have to pay for keeping these men in the penitentiary whether they work or whether they do not work.

His idea is simply that it would curtail public-highway construction in the State of Virginia by the amount of labor the convicts do plus 5 cents a day per convict.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. Does the Senator expect to conclude the consideration of the bill this afternoon?

Mr. McNARY. There is a very strong desire on the part of the chairman of the committee to conclude the consideration of the bill as rapidly as possible, though I do not want to deny anyone an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. KENDRICK. The Senator will recall that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] expressed himself very strongly in favor of striking out the House provision, and, as I recall, either he made the statement or a witness speaking for the State of Virginia made the statement that this provision in the bill would impose a direct cost on the State of Virginia of $2,000,000. Because of the interest of that State in the measure, I wondered if the Senator would not postpone action on this amendment until, say, to-morrow?

Mr. McNARY. I realize the importance of the presence of the distinguished Senator from Virginia, and, of course, I know his interest in the amendment. When the bill was called up for consideration at 2 o'clock I sent for the Senator from Virginia, but found he was out of the city. I feel I should hesitate to grant the request of the Senator only for the reason that if we start in to-morrow we will have to go through this whole discussion again.

Mr. KENDRICK. The Senator realizes that in a matter of so much importance as this to the State of Virginia the Senator from that State ought to have the opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I always want to be accommodating, and certainly I want every opportunity to be given to Members of the Senate to be present and to present their views. Would it not be proper and conform to the views of the Senator from Wyoming if we should postpone temporarily the further consideration of this amendment and see how we get along with the bill during the remainder of the afternoon? I will promise the Senator if we can not conclude the bill this evening, after giving such time as may be necessary to the consideration of other amendments, I shall be glad to have the bill go over until to-morrow for final consideration.

Mr. KENDRICK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I hope the chairman will do that. Although I do not agree with the Senator from Virginia, I am as anxious as anyone that he be present and be accorded a full opportunity to express his views.

Mr. McNARY. In view of these two very compelling pleas, I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the amendment be temporarily postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Bureau of Agricultural Economics," on page 71, line 9, after the word "work," to strike out "$356,790" and insert "$365,790," so as to read:

Foreign competition and demand: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to promote the agriculture of the United States by expanding in the foreign field the service now rendered by the United States Department of Agriculture in acquiring and diffusing useful information regarding agriculture, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1930, and for collecting and disseminating to American producers, importers, exporters, and other interested persons information relative to the world supply of and need for American agricultural products, marketing methods, conditions, prices, and other factors, a knowledge of which is necessary to the advantageous disposition of such products in foreign countries, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products, including the purchase of such books and periodicals and not to exceed $1,000 for newspapers as may be necessary in connection with this work, $365,790.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 14, after the word "grain," to insert "cottonseed"; and in line 20, after the word "products," to strike out "$1,380,808 and insert "$1,406,220," so as to read:

Market news service: For collecting, publishing, and distributing, by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the market supply and demand, commercial movement, location, disposition, quality, condition, and market prices of livestock, meats, fish, and animal products, dairy and poultry products, fruits and vegetables, peanuts and their products, grain, cottonseed, hay, feeds, tobacco, and seeds, and other agricultural products, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the production, transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products, $1,406,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 15, to change the total appropriation for salaries and expenses, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, from $5,128,291 to $5,162,703.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Oregon. We have adopted an amendment on page 51 increasing the appropriation for the acquisition of additional land from $200,000 to $245,940. The Senator, I suppose, is aware of the fact that under the act referred to under this particular appropriation researches have been made, units have been formed, and it is contemplated that in the State of Kentucky, and, I think, in the State of Minnesota—at least in those two States—projects have proceeded to a definite point where it is the policy of the department to organize forest reserves, and others are in process of being organized.

The purchase of some 580,000 acres of land in the Cumberland Mountains has been recommended by the National Forest Reservation Commission, composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, two Members of the Senate, and two Members of the House. My information is that the project for Kentucky has proceeded sufficiently far that the department now awaits only an appropriation to enable it to go ahead with the purchase of this land. Already options have been taken on land that I think probably aggregate 75,000 acres, and the same situation exists with reference to the reservation in Minnesota.

What is the attitude of the committee, if the Senator from Oregon is able to inform me, with reference to making available now a sufficient amount of money to enable the department or the National Forest Reservation Commission to go ahead and begin the purchase of this land, in order that these reservations may be established?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is asking me what is the attitude of the Senate committee concerning the acquisition of additional forest lands?

Mr. BARKLEY. With respect to the particular projects to which I have called attention. In other words, it is perfectly apparent that without the $245,000 carried in this bill for the acquisition of new lands for forest reserves nothing whatever can be done toward the purchase of the land necessary to complete this reserve in Kentucky; and, of course, I am frank to say that that is the one in which I am particularly interested, although the one in Minnesota occupies the same status as that in Kentucky. The only thing now remaining is the appropriation of the money to buy the land; and I contemplated offering an amendment to this item which would at least give the department enough money to begin.

I realize, of course, the financial situation. I have no desire to embarrass the Government; but, at the same time, this project has been under way for a long time. Options have been taken, and are being taken, and will soon be consummated, that will involve the purchase of at least 75,000 of the 580,000 acres contemplated in this eastern Kentucky reserve. I want to find out, if I can, when we may expect action, and what the attitude of the department is at the present time on that matter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I comprehend the comprehensiveness of the Senator's question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I congratulate the Senator from Oregon if he is able to comprehend an incomprehensible situation like that.

Mr. McNARY. I shall speak of the matter historically.

The act was passed in 1911. The commission created was called the National Forest Reservation Commission, which has acquired in the East the Great Lakes region and in the Southeast about 4,000,000 acres of land at a cost of $20,000,000, which is about $5 per acre. This plan was carried out under what was known at one time as the Clark-McNary bill, which authorized an expenditure of $2,000,000 annually. That amount is carried in current law, which is effective until July 1 of this year.

When the Budget estimate was made it called for $245,000, which did not provide further funds to acquire these lands. The House committee, and the House in conforming to the committee's action, reduced the amount to $200,000. When it came to the Senate committee we increased the amount to $245,000, which brought it to the estimate of the Director of the Budget. That does not permit the acquirement of any additional lands. It does permit the carrying on of the organization.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is the very point. It permits the carrying on of the organization, which means the payment of the salaries of all those who are in the particular division which has to do with the acquisition of new lands and the establishment of new forest reserves without their actually doing anything except waiting for some convenient time when Congress may make the money available.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no; that is not quite right. A great many of these employees are looking after the preservation and the prevention of fire on the lands already acquired, in excess of 4,000,000 acres, which survey work must be done. Abstracts of title must be examined; and they are all, according to the testimony, more or less employed. It was thought that the normal appropriation probably would be made in next year's bill, provided conditions return to normal, and that we would go ahead and carry out the announced policy of the Congress. As the Senator so well knows, the suspension is due to peculiar, distressful economic conditions. To do away with the organization, tear it down, dissipate it, and let these men go who are now occupied would destroy the structure that Congress has created during the years, and we would have no instrumentality available next year to carry on this splendid work of which the Senator speaks so highly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that, and I am not suggesting that the organization ought to be dissipated or crippled in any way; and I did not mean to intimate that the men who are employed are not engaged in useful service. What I had in mind was that the set-up being there, ready, probably without any increase in personnel or increase in the appropriation, simply for service in the department itself, it seems to that extent a waste of time to delay unduly the acquisition of these new forests, so that the real purposes of Congress with reference to the whole country might be consummated at as early a date as possible.

I understand that it is estimated that it will require about a million dollars to purchase these lands in the Cumberland Mountain section of the State of Kentucky. How much it will require to purchase the land in Minnesota, which is a project on the same footing as that in east Kentucky, I am not advised. What would be the Senator's attitude toward an amendment, if I should offer it, increasing this amount from $245,000 to $1,245,000, so that they might go ahead with the purchase of these lands?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am in very deep sympathy with the Senator's position. I, probably as reluctantly as any one on the committee, stood by and saw this job performed; but, as a practical question, if the Senator should offer an amendment to increase the appropriation, which does not carry a Budget estimate, as chairman of the subcommittee I should have to invoke the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, then, would invoke the rule declaring that an amendment of that sort, not estimated or recommended by the Budget, would be out of order?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; not being recommended by the Budget or by a standing committee of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator realizes that under the rules of the Senate we are not entirely hog-tied here with reference to appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. We are not so far as the functioning of the committee is concerned; but the Senator knows that if an appropriation is made, the bill is brought in here, and an attempt is made by a Member from the floor to increase that appropriation, unless he is fortified with a Budget estimate it is subject to the rule; and I necessarily should have to invoke the rule, as I stated.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not wish unduly to embarrass the Senator from Oregon by compelling him to invoke the rule against an amendment that I might offer; but may I hope that in the near future the Senator will be so convinced of the wisdom of this appropriation, and the continuance of this research work, and the acquisition of these additional lands, that he will assist me in securing the necessary appropriation to go ahead with this work?

Mr. McNARY. That request is not necessary. I think the Senator from Oregon has been more faithful and has expended more time along this line than has the able Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am perfectly willing to admit that.

Mr. McNARY. Indeed, the legislation that authorized an increased appropriation, about which the Senator now speaks, bears my name.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. And the Senator will find the Senator from Oregon supporting him or anyone else in a movement to increase these purchases whenever Congress feels that it can supply the money.

Mr. BARKLEY. That has particular reference to this Cumberland Mountain project in the State of Kentucky, as well as others?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I know nothing about that end of this matter. I only know that I am interested in providing sufficient appropriations for the commission to carry on its work. I am not interested in whether it acquires land in the Senator's State or some other State. I want it to be done for the best interest of the country. I will say that we have no land for sale in Oregon, either.

Mr. BARKLEY. Nor have I any for sale in Kentucky; but where the commission has gone far enough to recommend the purchase of land, and where it has recommended through the necessary channels the inclusion of that item in the Budget, and the Budget Bureau omit it only because the funds are not available, as they say, does not the Senator think that that creates a situation which justifies action on the part of Congress as soon as possible?

Mr. McNARY. I should say yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Oregon for a moment?

I am in receipt to-day of a cablegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Guam, in which they imply that the appropriation for the agricultural experiment station in Guam has been left out of this bill.

By reference to page 12 of the bill, it would appear that there is no cause for their worrying about this, because I see on line 2 that provision is made for the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Island of Guam. On the other hand, down at the bottom of the page, in line 24, it would look as though it was the intention of the Agricultural Department either to transfer or sell the experiment stations in Alaska, Guam, and the Virgin Islands.

Can the Senator inform me about that?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the language was stricken out as suggested by the able Senator from Connecticut. The chairman of the committee was authorized to offer an amendment which permits the sale of the property so much sought by the Senator.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not seeking the sale of the property.

Mr. McNARY. It simply authorizes the department, in the event it desires to do so, to dispose of the property in these Territories, or to carry them on.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can the Senator, then, tell us whether it is the intention of the department to close the station in Guam?

Mr. McNARY. No; but the department desires authority to do so if they deem it best to follow out that course. There is no suggestion that it is to be abandoned.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 77, line 7, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Agricultural Economics from $6,649,841 to $6,684,253.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Plant Quarantine," on page 80, line 4, to increase the appropriation for the control and prevention of the spread of the Japanese beetle from $375,000 to $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 1, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Quarantine from $2,748,405 to $2,773,405.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Food and Drug Administration," on page 82, line 16, after the word "therein," to strike out "$1,265,219" and insert "$1,275,819," so as to read:

Enforcement of the food and drugs act: For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906 (U. S. C., title 21, secs. 1–15), entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, or misbranded, or poisonous, or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes"; to cooperate with associations and scientific societies in the revision of the United States Pharmacopœia and development of methods of analysis, and for investigating the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and for inspecting the same before shipment when desired by the shippers or owners of these products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before the said products are allowed to be sold therein, $1,275,819.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 5, to change the total appropriation for the Food and Drug Administration from $1,716,167 to $1,726,767.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 13, to insert:

GRASSHOPPER CONTROL

For the application of such methods of control of grasshoppers as, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be necessary, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals as the Secretary may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and for other expenses, to be immediately available, $1,450,000, of which not to exceed $8,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That, except for general administration and supervision, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, expenditures under this appropriation shall be limited to the purchase and transportation of poisoned bait, or materials for its manufacture, and that the cooperating States shall be responsible for the local distribution and utilization of such bait, including full labor costs: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture no part of this appropriation shall be expended for grasshopper control in any State until such State has provided the necessary organization for the cooperation herein indicated: Provided further, That such aid be extended only to such counties or districts as in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture are not financially able to purchase poisoned-bran bait for such grasshopper control: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of farm animals, farm crops, or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in connection with the committee amendment which the clerk has just read, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes to amend the committee amendment by striking out, on page 86, in lines 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, the following words:

Provided further, That such aid be extended only to such counties or districts as in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture are not financially able to purchase poisoned-bran bait for such grasshopper control.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the intent of the general committee amendment is that of affording cooperation on the part of the Federal Government with the States, and the lesser subdivisions, in the endeavor to meet the dangers confronting certain States by reason of the infestation of the grasshopper last year. This particular provision which I am attempting to have eliminated would, instead of affording cooperation with the States, almost compel a county which wanted this aid, and which needed it, to make a pauper's affidavit of inability to do that work itself. It is entirely out of step and out of keeping with the general intent of the amendment as a whole. I hope the amendment may prevail.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is some merit in the position taken by the Senator from North Dakota. In an examination of the administrator of this activity before the committee the general thought was expressed that it was to be cooperative between the Government and the counties in the States involved. The Federal Government's duty consists solely of acquiring the poison and delivering it. It is the duty of the counties and the States where there is an infestation to distribute the poison solely on a cooperative basis.

This language, I think, probably is a little awkward in view of the essential requirements that there should be cooperation between the States and the counties and the Federal Government, and I have no objection to its elimination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there seems to be a typographical error in the bill. I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the amendment containing the word "cottonseed" on page 72, line 14. That should have been inserted in line 20, page 71. Has that correction been made?

Mr. McNARY. It has not been corrected. My attention was not called to it until to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that the committee amendments are to be acted on first.

Mr. GORE. This is a committee amendment, but it is a typographical error.

Mr. McNARY. The amendment is found in the wrong section.

Mr. GORE. I would like to have the amendment inserted in the proper place, after the word "cotton" in line 20, page 71.

Mr. McNARY. It should be inserted on page 71, line 20. After the word "cotton" the word "cottonseed" should be inserted, and should be stricken out on page 72, under the head of "Market news service."

Mr. GORE. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I have felt considerable interest in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the amendment suggested by the committee on page 85 proposes an expenditure of nearly a million and a half dollars for poison for the eradication of grasshoppers. That is a good deal of money these days. We are running behind now at the rate of eight or nine or ten million dollars a day. There is no immediate prospect of any revenue to enable the Government fully to meet that deficit, and before voting on this amendment I should like to have the argument stated as to the great necessity that must have existed to persuade those who are in favor of this amendment to vote for it. It seems like a very large amount of money.

I understand that there was a grasshopper plague last summer, and it is quite likely that there might be other plagues next summer which might apply to some of the industrial States of the East which have hitherto escaped the plague of grasshoppers. But before voting for this amendment, I would like to know just why it is necessary for us at this time to add nearly a million and a half dollars to the Government's Budget for this particular item.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this item was sanctioned and recommended by the Director of the Budget, and came before the Committee on Appropriations when hearings were had. Mr. Marlott, of the department, appeared in behalf of it. It anticipates the very severe infestation of grasshoppers in six or seven of the States near the Great Lakes and bordering to the west.

It provides for cooperation between the States and the Government. The matter received very careful consideration by the department, it was recommended as being a meritorious project, and was sanctioned by the Director of the Budget. These grasshoppers have bred and laid their eggs in great numbers on account of the dry season in the last two years. It is thought that if funds are not available for doing something, if the infestation shall occur, the scourge will be very great in the States affected.

I called the attention of Doctor Marlott to the situation recently concerning the probable infestation, and I have a note from him, which I will send to the desk, and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1932.

Memorandum for Senator MCNARY.
Re: Grasshopper situation in the northern section of the plains States west of the Mississippi.

The unusual situation has resulted from the breeding up during three favorable years, i. e., years of drought, of grasshoppers in increasing populations so that in the season of 1931 they reached such numbers as to cause almost complete destruction of small grains, corn, and other crops over considerable areas. Such destruction was not due to the old-time migratory locust but to the breeding up chiefly of two local species which are always present in greater or less numbers and which are essentially nonmigratory.

The basis of the anticipated grasshopper menace for the coming season is the enormous egg laying which has been determined by surveys particularly in Colorado, Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming, and the further fact that the conditions so far have been of such character as to indicate very little egg mortality, as determined by field examinations. There is every reason to anticipate, therefore, a very large percentage of hatching of young grasshoppers. Cold and wet weather at hatching time may, however, destroy a considerable percentage of the young. The funds will, therefore, be looked upon as an insurance and will be spent only in proportion to the actual need.

In the late summer and fall these grasshoppers deposit their eggs, choosing normally sunny and well-drained areas, roadsides, edges of fields, etc., where they congregate in numbers and in this way the egg laying is more or less concentrated rather than generally distributed, which greatly facilitates control.

There are two important methods of control. One is the plowing up of the eggs in the fall and winter—not usually widely possible. The more favorable means is by distribution of poison-bran bait, making these distributions over the period of hatching of the young grasshoppers. Such hatching takes place between April and June.

The poison bait can be distributed in any convenient manner, either by hand from buckets or from light wagons or carts, or even light auto trucks, and may be scattered very much the way the small grains were broadcast in the old days. The young grasshoppers will feed on this bran bait and are killed. There is no poisoning of growing vegetation and the killing is due to the eating of the bran, which the grasshoppers take to greedily. The object is to destroy them at the outset, before they have migrated by crawling to grain fields. It is usually impracticable to destroy them by poisons after they have become winged, although, in one or two instances, some success in this direction was obtained last year by spreading the bait with the use of an airplane, similar to the method of dusting cotton used to some extent in the South. It is not believed that this type of control by airplane will often be practicable.

As indicated in the appropriation item and in the discussion, it is the understanding that the department is to provide the bait and deliver it to strategic places in the counties and States where it is to be used, and that local county and State organizations will undertake the handling and more intimate distribution to the farmers and cooperation with the farmers in seeing that the poison is properly and effectively used. Necessarily also a certain amount of Government supervision is to be provided to give assurance of need for, and economical usage, of the bait.

The appropriation language does not limit the use of this poison to the States named but it is believed that these States will probably include most, if not all, of the essential needs of Federal aid. If, however, such aid is needed elsewhere in this general plains area and the funds permit of it, it can be rendered. Inasmuch as grasshoppers may, in limited areas, be more or less destructive almost anywhere in the United States, it is obvious that this appropriation can not be looked upon as a general grasshopper-control item for the whole country. In practically all such instances, outside of the plains area indicated, local control in the usual manner will be possible without Federal aid.

Sincerely yours,

C. L. MARLATT, Chief of Bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, it has been suggested that there should be a little explanation of this item. The fact is overlooked that the Budget, in its recommendation, suggested that the cost of the extermination of this pest which was proposed would be about $3,000,000, and that the Government should furnish $1,450,000. In other words, it puts 50 per cent of the burden on the localities, on the States, and the counties, and the farmers, which is entirely different from the method used for exterminating pests in other States, like the citrus bug in Florida, the corn borer, the Japanese beetle, and so forth.

My suggestion is that the amendment is too restricted and places an impossible burden upon the localities, even to the point of cleaning up grasshoppers on Government land, on the public domain, on public highways, on abandoned farms, and so forth.

I just rise to ask unanimous consent that I may offer an amendment to the amendment to add half a million dollars to the item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. What is the nature of the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. NORBECK. To increase the amount by half a million dollars.

Mr. MCNARY. That would make it $1,950,000.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

Mr. MCNARY. Has there been an estimate made for it?

Mr. NORBECK. No; that exceeds the estimate; but it would be in line with what the Government has done in meeting the pest situations in other places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsideration?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, that is a very considerable item. It has not been estimated for. The whole matter was covered by the Budget. I would not feel free to waive the rule of the Senate unless there were an estimate. The amendment could be offered very well, though, to the deficiency bill, if the sum appropriated is found to be deficient. For that reason I would not want the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. NORBECK. Then I withdraw my request for a reconsideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was called from the floor while this matter was under general discussion. May I ask the Senator from Oregon whether or not there were any specific States designated that were intended to be the beneficiaries of this activity, or would it be possible for other States not mentioned in the Budget estimate to come in under the terms of the provision in case they can convince the administrative authorities that they are entitled to assistance in meeting this pest?

Mr. MCNARY. I think the able Senator from Wisconsin suggested that inquiry to me before we took up the consideration of the bill and I assured him that I would discuss the matter with the department. While in the report seven or eight States are mentioned where the infestation will probably occur, the department said the money would be available wherever there was any infestation, whether it was enumerated in the report or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wanted the RECORD to show that, because there is one county in Wisconsin, Door County, that has been fighting this pest for some time. They feel that they should be considered in the allocation of funds for fighting the pest. I thank the Senator from Oregon.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 38, line 7, after the word "him," to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses and station wagons) at a cost, delivered and completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes, and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment. This limitation as to price shall not apply to any motor vehicle purchased for official use of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon give us some explanation of the reasons which persuaded the committee to strike out this provision?

Mr. MCNARY. This particular language was placed in the House bill limiting the value of automobiles at $750, plus their paid-in value and freight. The department objected to it because they found greater utility in a heavier car. They have found that by using a car in the so-called 3,000-pound class they could save about a cent per gallon on gasoline, that it is more efficient and has a greater capacity for doing work. Particularly the Bureau of Roads took that position.

The committee believed it in the interest of economy and the efficiency of the department to strike out the language so we might be able to go into conference and work out something more satisfactory. The department did say if it was included, increasing the amount from $750 to $950, there would not be any objection.

Mr. REED. Would not that be a wiser amendment?

Mr. McNARY. We thought probably that would be what we would determine on in conference, and that we would have full latitude in this fashion by striking it out.

Mr. REED. I confess I have a good deal of sympathy with the intention of the House.

Mr. McNARY. There is no question about it; but if we consider $750 as the purchase price plus the trade-in value and the freight, it brings a very small car to the use of the department. It is necessary to have a larger car for their rough work, which they claim is found in the 3,000-pound class, and which can not be purchased for this amount of money. Consequently, the committee thought we would strike out the matter and go to conference and there work out something that would be advantageous from the standpoint of the principle involved, without impairing the efficiency of the department.

Mr. REED. I know in the Army there is constantly an effort to get the larger and more expensive cars, but we find that the small car almost always serves the purpose in every respect except that it does not gratify the vanity of the person who is to operate it.

Mr. McNARY. Probably that is true, but for the road work, which is rough, hard work in the hills and mountains, it is essential to have a sturdy well-built car. I am distinctly in sympathy with the Senator's position, but I am confident that in conference we can work out something satisfactory.

Mr. REED. I think the country looks to us to make economies in such matters.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, does the Senator from Oregon know the particular reason why the House put this provision in the bill or the reasons that were given?

Mr. McNARY. It was placed in the bill in the House by an amendment offered on the floor. I did not read the RECORD. I assume that the House thought it was in the interest of economy and would not in any way disturb the efficiency of the department.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I was wondering if there were any developments before the House committee with reference to the waste of public funds in the buying of automobiles. I really do not know myself. I have known of cases where it would have been very advisable to have a restriction of this character in the law. Some bureau gets hold of public funds and goes mad with extravagance, goes out and buys very expensive automobiles instead of protecting the public interest and buying a reasonably priced car.

Without any definite information, of course, I am not going to oppose the action of the Senate committee in proposing to strike out the provision; but I rather think that the House provision is a wise one and would tend to prevent an increase in the maximum price of cars to be purchased. Too often the different bureaus or different agencies of the Government, as soon as they gain possession of public funds, start in with a reckless disregard of the public interest and waste moneys which are placed in their hands for expenditure. I do not know that that is true with regard to the Bureau of Roads. I hope it is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 91, after line 22, to strike out:

SEC. 2. No appropriation under the Department of Agriculture available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act, as amended, for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other position of the Federal Government under such department. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

And, on page 92, after line 23, to strike out:

SEC. 3. No appropriation under the Department of Agriculture available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act to pay the compensation of an incumbent appointed to any position under the Federal Government which is vacant on the date of the approval of this act or to any such position which may become vacant after such date: Provided, That this inhibition shall not apply to absolutely essential positions the filling of which may be approved in writing by the President of the United States. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for ahy other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of all such vacancies, the number thereof filled, and the amounts unexpended for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 3, to change the total appropriation for the Department of Agriculture from $175,408,814 to $178,192,646.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the formal committee amendments.

Mr. McNARY. I have one or two amendments to offer in behalf of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the clerk read so rapidly and the amendment was approved so rapidly that we were given no opportunity to offer an amendment to the House text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to offer an amendment to the House text?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; and for that purpose I shall be glad to have the action of the Senate in adopting the amendment reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this is the salary restriction provision which the Senate proposes to strike from the House text. I am not in favor of any curtailment of salaries in the lower and medium ranges; but it having appeared in more or less instances that there has been a reckless disregard of economy, although advocated by the President and pretended by many Members of the Congress, I have thought that probably a provision of the character recommended by the House and inserted by it in the bill would accomplish some good in the administration of this and other appropriation acts. I do not, however, approve of it applying to the smaller salaries.

We know that some three or four years ago we passed the reclassification act, by which those in the higher brackets had their salaries very substantially increased while those in the lower brackets received practically no increase in compensation. That was not the intention of Congress at all. It resulted in a complete miscarriage of the purpose and intention of the Congress when we enacted the reclassification act. I think that those receiving the lower salaries—$1,200, $1,500, $1,800, and $2,000—have already been once mistreated and that they should not now be restricted, so that they can not possibly get any promotion during the period covered by the appropriation bill. I do not favor that feature as embraced in the House text, which the Senate committee now proposes to strike out.

I want to propose an amendment, however, in order that it may be inserted in the RECORD. I propose to amend the House text for the purpose of perfecting the House text. On page 92, line 1, after the word "compensation," I move to insert the words "where the salary is $3,000 or more per annum"; in line 4, page 92, after the word "compensation," to insert the words "where the salary is $3,000 or more per annum"; and in line 9, page 92, after the word "compensation," to insert the words "where the salary is $3,000 or more per annum."

That would make the provision against any increases apply only to salaries of $3,000 or more per annum. In other words, under that provision Government employees would receive their automatic advances or promotions as they are entitled to them under the reclassification act, but those with salaries above that amount would not receive any increase during the period of the applicability of this appropriation. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to perfecting the House text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida was to amend an amendment on the part of the Senate which is to strike out.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Florida offered his amendment to the House text. He had the right to do that. Then the question arises whether we will accept the Senate committee attitude and strike it all out, which is the question now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment to strike out the House text as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, from the committee I am authorized to propose the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, after the word "sold," in line 25, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to transfer to any Government department or establishment or to local authorities or institutions such property and/or equipment or to sell the same at public or private sale and to pay from this appropriation the salaries of the present employees of said stations appointed from the continental United States, including salaries during such leave as may be granted under the acts approved June 30, 1914, and July 24, 1919 (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 535 and 536), together with traveling expenses of themselves and families, including the transportation of such quantity and character of their personal effects as may be authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture, in returning to the usual port of debarkation in the United States, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Hawaii and Porto Rico, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. In behalf of the committee I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, line 5, strike out "three-year" and insert in lieu thereof "two-year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 66, line 9, insert before the period a comma and the following:

And such sum shall be paid to the authorities of such State without the requirement that the State shall have expended or made available for expenditure a like sum from State funds; and such sum shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of five years, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, by making deductions from regular apportionments to the State of Alabama made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation of the amendment. At the outset, I will state that the Senate has three times voted in favor of a similar provision. This was done in 1930.

The necessity for the amendment arises from the following situation: In 1929 there was a very severe flood in the Southeastern States. It practically destroyed many of the Federal-aid roads. The Senate and House passed and the President signed a bill which authorized the extension of Federal-aid money to assist in rebuilding those highways. The provision to which I have referred, as it passed on previous occasions, provided that both past and future expenditures on those highways should be considered. The State of Alabama has insisted that probably it has met this requirement, and that it has really expended more than it is required to expend; but, by reason of the location of certain lines established by the highway department, that it has not been given credit for as much expenditure as it should. But, be that proposition as it may, there is a balance yet left of this money which is unexpended. The money has been appropriated for several years—since 1929. This amendment calls for not one dollar of additional appropriation. It simply calls for the use of an appropriation which was made in 1929. Anticipating that some might say, if the State should not be required completely to match the funds that it might be unfair to some other States, I have provided in the amendment, just as was provided in the other amendment which the Senate adopted, that hereafter the State of Alabama shall have deducted from its Federal-highway allotment, in installments of one-fifth each year, an amount equal to the unexpended balance in the flood-aid fund.

Therefore the sum total of the amendment is this: An appropriation has been made; it is lying in the Treasury unexpended. The State of Alabama can not match it at the present time. If this amendment shall be adopted, that unexpended money will be immediately put to work in the construction of highways and repairing highways in Alabama which were injured by the flood. Therefore, Mr. President, I feel sure there will be no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

I will state further that after complete argument the Senate adopted this amendment in 1930. Thereafter when its conferees came back for instructions the Senate, by a large vote, instructed them not to recede from the amendment. The Senate did the same thing, as I recall, the second time, but finally, when those in charge of the conference report for the House of Representatives would not yield, I did not feel justified in longer asking the Senate to insist upon an adherence to this particular amendment. Therefore I did not ask for another vote upon the question.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama is there not a bill now pending providing for Government aid to highways without the matching principle being applied? If that bill should become a law, does he propose that this appropriation shall be in addition to the one carried in the bill to which I refer? Would his amendment be in addition to that?

Mr. BLACK. This amendment has no connection, I may say to the Senator from South Carolina, with any of the other highway bills.

Mr. SMITH. The point I am making is this: There is a proposition in a bill now pending to extend Federal aid without the immediate matching of the funds by the States.

Mr. GEORGE. That is a special fund.

Mr. SMITH. That would be a special fund to carry on the work to a certain extent in the States. Now the Senator from Alabama proposes that this unexpended balance shall also be used without matching.

Mr. BLACK. I propose that it shall be matched at a later date—simply to defer the time when it shall be matched.

Mr. SMITH. And when the State shall be able to match the fund there will be deducted later from that State's quota the amount that has been advanced under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from South Carolina is correct.

Mr. SMITH. I was merely wondering if that would interfere at all with the quota which the Senator's State might obtain under the measure now pending according to which the Federal funds would not need to be matched by the States.

Mr. BLACK. My amendment would not be affected at all by the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina refers. The sum total of the amendment is to permit the present utilization of a fund which has been appropriated for three years with ample protection to the Federal Government by the provision that the amount shall later be deducted from the advances or allotments made to the State.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Alabama provides for deductions to be made from Federal-aid funds which may hereafter be allocated to the State of Alabama?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Over a period of five years?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Commencing five years from this time?

Mr. BLACK. Commencing five years from 1934, as I recall the way I drew the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Is the amendment in the precise form in which it passed the Senate on two former occasions?

Mr. BLACK. There is one difference, which I can explain to the Senator, not in effect but in wording.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to have the explanation.

Mr. BLACK. The amendment as previously adopted was in this language:

Provided further, That the balance of the appropriation of $1,660,000 now unpaid to the State of Alabama, appropriated for the relief of the State of Alabama as a reimbursement or contribution in aid induced by extraordinary floods, shall be paid to the authorities of that State without the requirement that the State match said expenditure except in the manner provided herein.

The amendment I have just read was offered as an amendment to the emergency highway bill, which provided for deductions from year to year. Since this particular bill is not in the language of the emergency appropriation bill to which I offered the original amendment it was necessary for me to make it conform to the proposal of the emergency highway bill, and the legislative reference bureau drafted it in that way.

Mr. McNARY. In what year did Congress take action on this matter?

Mr. BLACK. The amendment was acted on in 1930. I have before me the debate which then occurred.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the able Senator, Was the original amendment offered to the bill which provided for the reconstruction of roads which were destroyed by floods in Alabama?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Will the amendment appertain to any other Southern State than Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. It should apply also to the States of Georgia and South Carolina.

Mr. GEORGE. But in a lesser amount.

Mr. McNARY. Is the amendment offered by the Senator limited to the State of Alabama or does it comprehend the same condition in the two other States mentioned?

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that I took it up with the other Senators who are interested, but I limited this particular amendment to Alabama because Alabama is treated separately in the pending bill. It is my understanding that amendments will be offered for the other States that are involved in the exact condition; but my amendment is limited to the State of Alabama.

Mr. McNARY. If that be true, why should there not be one amendment to include all the States involved in the original act which was passed in 1927, as I recall?

Mr. BLACK. May I say to the Senator that the reason I did not think it was wise to join the three States together was because, as the Senator will find if he will look on pages 65 and 66 of the bill, the States are treated separately as the bill is now written. For instance, on page 65 appears a relief provision for Georgia and South Carolina, while on page 66 appears a relief provision for Alabama. So I concluded it would be better for me simply to offer the amendment in so far as it applies to Alabama. I may state further to the Senator that when this matter was voted on previously, and when the Senate declined to accept the conference report, the provision also included similar relief for the State of Georgia and the State of South Carolina.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Alabama has referred to the provision of the bill on page 65. I am curious to know if the States of Georgia and South Carolina also want to be included in an amendment similar to that now proposed by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I propose, if the Senator will permit me, to offer a similar amendment with reference to the appropriation made for the State of Georgia, and, with the permission of the Senator from South Carolina, I will include that State.

Mr. SMITH. I think this being an appropriation of the same character brought about by the same storm—the storm of 1928, as I recall—that the amendment ought to be made to comprehend the three States, because the conditions are of the same nature and the unexpended balance is needed now.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon has the floor I ask him if he will yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I merely wish to make the statement that I am informed by the Bureau of Public Roads that, so far as South Carolina is concerned, all the sum has been expended with the exception of possibly $65,000, which is obligated. So the amendment would be of no value to that State.

Mr. McNARY. Then it is not the purpose to include South Carolina, which was provided for in the original act?

Mr. BYRNES. I can only say, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to do so, but I understand from the Senator from Georgia and the senior Senator from South Carolina that some amendment of that kind will be offered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I propose to offer an amendment similar to that offered by the Senator from Alabama so far as the appropriation to the State of Georgia is concerned, but the appropriation which will be available to Georgia under the amendment—that is, which will be immediately available—will be a much less sum than the amount that Alabama may be able to utilize.

Mr. McNARY. Is the State of Georgia able to meet the situation without a deferment of the matching of the Federal-aid funds?

Mr. GEORGE. The State, as I am advised, is unable to meet this particular appropriation at this time. Of course, it would hope to do so within the period of the extension carried in this bill—that is, until June 30, 1933—but if it can be made immediately available on the terms and conditions stipulated in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama it will be desirable to have it take that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to ask if South Carolina was included in the amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. I will be glad to include it in my amendment if the Senator wishes it done.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to have included the unexpended balance to which South Carolina may be entitled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the vote was on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, and the provisions of his amendment are limited to Alabama.

Mr. GEORGE. I rather think it will be necessary formally to offer the amendment, inasmuch as the two matters are carried in separate items in the bill. I therefore move to strike out the period at the end of line 2 on page 66, insert a comma and the words which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 66, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

And such sums shall be paid to the authorities of such State without the requirement that the State shall have expended or made available for expenditure a like sum from State funds; and such sum shall be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of five years, beginning with the fiscal year 1934, by making deductions from regular apportionments to the States of Georgia and South Carolina made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida offers the following amendment:

On page 94, after line 2, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 3. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Mediterranean fruit fly board, to be composed of five persons to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, two of whom shall be representatives of the Department of Agriculture (one to be chairman of the board), two citizens of the State of Florida, and one man at large. Any vacancy occurring in the board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Each member of the board, other than members holding office under the Federal Government, shall receive compensation at the rate of $10 per day while actually employed on the business of the board. The board shall cease to exist upon transmitting its report as herein provided.

"The board is authorized and directed to (1) conduct a complete investigation and survey of actual losses sustained by growers and farmers in the State of Florida resulting directly from the campaign to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly in such State; (2) receive claims for actual losses sustained by such persons in the State of Florida by reason of direct damage resulting from such campaign, supported by such proof as the board by regulation may prescribe; (3) report the facts and make findings upon such claims as to the amount of actual loss sustained; and (4) transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture not later than 90 days after the approval of this act a report of the survey and its findings in respect of claims for such losses: Provided, That such report and finding shall serve as information only for consideration and not be binding on the Secretary of Agriculture or Congress. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, within 30 days after receiving such report, or if Congress is not in session then at the beginning of the December (1932) session of Congress, transmit such report of survey to Congress, together with such recommendations as he may, in his judgment, deem advisable.

"The regular employees of the Department of Agriculture shall be used as far as possible, but the board may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, appoint in addition thereto and fix the compensation (without regard to the civil service laws and regulations or to the classification act of 1923, as amended) of such other employees as may be necessary, and may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, make such expenditures, including expenditures for travel and subsistence expenses, for personal services at the seat of Government and elsewhere, and for printing and binding, as are necessary for the efficient execution of its functions under this section. All expenses of the board shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board and the Secretary of Agriculture.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this amendment collides with Rule XVI of the Senate, of course. It is legislation on an appropriation bill and is not authorized by a standing committee of the Senate, nor has it been estimated by the Director of the Budget.

I understand that the Senator from Florida anticipated that this criticism would be made and gave notice of a motion to suspend the rules, which, of course, would require a two-thirds vote. Does the Senator desire to press his amendment to-night and ask for a vote, or would he rather wait until to-morrow?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I call attention to the notice given on page 4309 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks have the notice on the desk.

Mr. TRAMMELL. And I desire to propose the amendment, so that that question may be pending.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I think that is quite proper.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will move to take a recess now——

Mr. McNARY. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Florida and others present, I shall ask the Senate to take a recess until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Oregon made the point of order?

Mr. McNARY. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Florida now has proposed his amendment. To-morrow we will vote upon the question of suspension of the rules.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The status, as I understand, is that after the point of order is sustained I then propose the amendment with my notice as given on February 19 and found on page 4309 of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What the Senator desires to do is to make his motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I make that motion, so that the question will be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the pending question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this afternoon we have adopted a number of amendments increasing by a very considerable amount the appropriation bill as it came over from the House. We have voted $1,000,000 for the World's Fair at Chicago. We have voted a million and a half dollars to feed poisoned bran to unborn grasshoppers, which it is expected will arrive some time next spring. We have increased other appropriations. In the meantime, the afternoon paper comes out with a dispatch from the Associated Press which it seems to me should act somewhat in the nature of the signs to which we so often pay no attention at railroad crossings, "Stop, look, and listen!"

This dispatch is a short one, and I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to read it:

The Government entered March with a $1,781,017,496 deficit.

Mr. President, that represents a monthly deficit of $222,000,000 during the eight months of this fiscal year, or a daily deficit of approximately $8,000,000.

The Associated Press dispatch goes on to say:

This was shown to-day in the Treasury report for February 29. For the eight months of the fiscal year the Treasury collected from all sources $1,334,563,076 and spent $3,115,580,572.

The deficit threatens to approach the $3,000,000,000 mark.

Actually, it is somewhere in the neighborhood of $2,700,000,000 if we go on at the rate that we are at present going, and without any additional expenditure for grasshoppers.

The deficit threatens to approach the $3,000,000,000 mark unless additional taxes levied by Congress change the complexion of the Government's ledger sheet.

As in the past two years, the chief cause of the deficit has been a severe drop in income-tax collections. For the eight months this source of revenue has returned $658,121,342, compared with $1,171,431,024 in the same period last year.

Or a drop of half a billion dollars; and everyone knows that when Uncle Sam takes his income-tax returns into his private chamber and looks at them on the 15th of March next the shrinkage for the past year is going to be far greater than it was for the year before that.

At the same time miscellaneous internal revenue has dropped $34,000,000 to $345,000,000 and customs duties declined from $258,000,000 in the previous year to $247,000,000 this year.

The gross public debt was increased nearly $2,000,000,000 last year, amounting to $18,125,633,155.

Mr. President, it seems to me the time has come for us to cut appropriations rather than to increase them, no matter how worthy the object may be.

In an adjoining column another dispatch from the Associated Press calls attention to the fact that—

The big new revenue bill, which is to raise more than a billion dollars a year for the Federal Government in addition to its present income, has been completely drawn at last and is to be ready for the House by Saturday.

This bill proposes to put a 2 per cent tax on manufactures—

To yield about $525,000,000; special excise levies on selected industries to produce $300,000,000, and increases in income, estate, and gift taxes to bring in an additional $200,000,000.

All that is guesswork. No one knows whether it will raise as much as that or not; but those things, added together, produce only $825,000,000. The committee hope that some provisions of their bill will save losses amounting to $100,000,000. They do not state how that is to be done, but that brings the total up to $900,000,000. Then, they say that they expect to save $125,000,000 in Government expenditures, and therefore get somewhere near a billion dollars, either by addition or by subtraction, during this fiscal year. The deficit that we are facing to-day, however, is a deficit which at the end of the fiscal year will approach $2,700,000,000.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to pause a little bit before we gayly go ahead and spend a million dollars on beautiful buildings for a World's Fair, which would be a marvelous thing to do if we could afford to do it; and we ought to wait until the grasshoppers arrive before we appropriate a million and a half dollars to feed them poisoned bran.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to clear up an apparent error.

When the Subcommittee on Appropriations held hearings, it was agreed that the Ardmore Experiment Station in western South Dakota would be continued on the plan of previous years. This is an old station, which has been running a long time. It was voted or agreed to put in the appropriation necessary to carry it on; and that was done, as far as we knew at the time, and we relied on the Budget Officer to guide us. I find, however, that that appropriation comes under several heads, and that one of $7,065 to carry on the dairy herd was overlooked or omitted.

I ask unanimous consent that that error be corrected. It is pure folly to carry on a dry-farming experiment station, and make a lot of hay, and then send the cows away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 30, line 22, it is proposed to strike out "$648,068" and insert in lieu thereof "$655,133."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill to be printed and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie upon the table.

THE WHOLESOMENESS AND FOOD VALUE OF MARGARINE

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on the Wholesomeness and Food Value of Margarine, by J. S. Abbott, a former pure food commissioner of Texas and formerly chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, United States Department of Agriculture, January 10, 1932.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is conceded by all scientific authority that margarine is a pure and wholesome food. The products used in its manufacture are well-known articles of food. They have been eaten in one form or another every day from time immemorial. The Government publishes (internal-revenue bulletins, Annual Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1931) monthly a complete list of them. The principal ones are beef fat, pork fat, cottonseed oil, coconut oil, peanut oil, corn oil, salt, milk, and butter.

A large part of a good beefsteak is beef fat. A large part of a good pork roast is pork fat. Peanuts and peanut butter are rich in peanut oil. Salad oils contain cottonseed oil, or peanut oil, or corn oil compounded with olive oil. Mayonnaise, sandwich spreads, lard, lard compounds, and cooking fats made of cottonseed oil and other vegetable oils are all made of one or more of the same kind of food fats that are used in the manufacture of margarine. About 3,000,000,000 pounds of such fat products are consumed annually in the United States. (Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce Reports.) Salt, milk, and butter are consumed in large quantities every day. The wholesomeness of all of these food products is beyond question.

The wholesomeness of margarine is recognized by scientific men, scientific societies, public-health agencies, and by governmental agencies everywhere in the world. To be specific, it is recognized by the United States Department of Agriculture, the United States Public Health Service, State and city boards of health, and leading nutrition workers everywhere. Doctors Wiley, Eddy (Good Housekeeping, April, 1929), Halliburton and Drummond (Journal of Physiology, September, 1917), Osborne and Mendel (Journal of Biological Chemistry, March, 1920), Alsberg (address before annual convention of Institute of Margarine Manufacturers), Sherman (Food Products), and hosts of other nutrition workers have declared that it is a wholesome food.

Congress (act of August 2, 1886 (24 Stat., 209)), State legislatures, and city councils have enacted laws and ordinances defining oleomargarine and regulating its composition, manufacture, branding, and sale for food. Thus the legislative branches of our Government recognize it as a wholesome food. Our courts (Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S. 1)) take judicial notice of the fact.

In its manufactured form, oleomargarine consists of about 82 per cent fat, 1½ per cent casein, 2 per cent salt, and 15 per cent of water. The casein, including small quantities of valuable mineral salts normal to milk, comes from the milk used in its manufacture. The water may come from the same source. The salt is the same common salt that is so generally used as food. The food value of milk and salt is so well known that there is no necessity for any comment on these constituents. The food value of the fats used in making oleomargarine is also well known.

The primary function of a fat in the diet is to make our food more attractive and palatable and to supply our bodies with heat and muscle energy. Energy value is measured and expressed in terms of digestibility and calories. According to McCollum (Dr. E. V. McCollum, The Day's Food in War and Peace, by the United States Department of Agriculture and the United States Food Administration), one kind of food fat is "digested with practically the same ease and completeness" as any other kind of food fat. This opinion is shared by Holmes (The Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, vol. 192, No. 25, June, 1925), Flurin, Mayer, Snyder, Luhrig, and numerous other investigators. The energy value of one kind of edible fat is the same as the energy value of any other kind. This fact is so universally accepted that references to scientific authority are unnecessary.

The mineral content of oleomargarine, butter, and other food fats is so small that it need not be taken into account in evaluating this group of food nutrients.

The taste, flavor, aroma, texture, body, color, and other physical properties of oleomargarine are well known. They add greatly to its physiological and commercial value as a food.

Until within recent years, it was believed that all of our food nutrients or food factors could be grouped into five well-known classes, viz., proteins, carbohydrates, fats, mineral salts, and water. We now know that there is another important class which should be added to the list, viz., vitamins.

Vitamins are of vegetable origin. Warm-blooded animals secure their supply of them directly or indirectly from the vegetable kingdom. The word "indirectly" is used because the carnivorous groups of animals and birds must obtain their supply from other animals which have stored up vitamins from the vegetable kingdom in the first instance. This fact is important and should be emphasized—that the great storehouse of the vitamins is primarily in green plants, vegetables, cereals, and fruits, and secondarily in animal products.

There are several different kinds of vitamins. They are designated by letters of the alphabet as vitamin A, vitamin B (F and G), vitamin C, vitamin D, and vitamin E.

Vitamin A is secured from the foods we eat. It is found in good quantity in spinach, cabbage, carrots, chard, kale, squash, celery, lettuce, tomatoes, eggs, most yellow oils, beef fat, fish liver, pig's liver, beef liver, kidney, glandular organs in general, sweetpotatoes, yellow corn, milk, cream, cheese, some grades of butter, some grades of oleomargarine, and in some 50 or more other common articles of food in greater or lesser quantities, depending upon certain well-known conditions.

Halliburton and Drummond (Journal of Physiology, September, 1917) found that "Margarine containing oleo oil is quite able to replace butter in satisfying the nutritive requirements of young animals." This was confirmed by Osborne and Mendel's experiments. (Proceedings of Physiological Society, Journal of Physiology, vol. 51, p. 8, 1917.) Their experiments were confirmed by Fetter and Carlson (the American Journal of Physiology, vol. 96, No. 2, February, 1931), who found that oleo-oil margarine churned in whole milk is equal to butter in vitamin A. Margarines made of vegetable oils contain smaller quantities of vitamin A derived from and depending upon the vitamin A content of the milk used in their manufacture. They also contain vitamin E, for the vegetable oils used in making them are listed as good sources of this vitamin. (Vitamine Chart, South Carolina Food Research Commission.) Golding (address before the World's Dairy Congress, 1923, by Capt. John Golding, D. S. O., F. I. C.) reports that butter made of the milk from cows on green pastures is 10 times as rich in vitamin A as butter made of the milk from cows on dry feed or winter feed. Steenbock (Journal Biological Chemistry, September, 1918) reported an experiment in which the butter from a cow fed exclusively on alfalfa hay did not contain any of this vitamin.

There are no vitamins B (F and G) or C or D in oleomargarine or butter in any appreciable quantity.

Because of the wide distribution of vitamin A in the many common articles of food we eat, and especially of efficient quantities of it in milk, eggs, and leafy vegetables, McCollum, (Dr. E. V. McCollum, department of hygiene and public health, Johns Hopkins University, p. 38, McCall's Magazine, November, 1924) has said that, although butter is one of the best sources of this vitamin, it is not essential to use butter to secure it, and that the housewife who is obliged to practice economy will do better to spend her money on milk and green vegetables than on butter, because milk and green vegetables are rich sources of this vitamin. Substantially the same statements have been made by Eddy (Dr. Walter H. Eddy, professor of physiological chemistry, Teachers College, Columbia University; Good Housekeeping, vol. 88, No. 4, pp. 97, 250, 251, 252, April, 1929) and many other nutrition workers.

The Medical Research Council of England (special report series No. 105, Medical Research Council, London, England), according to its special report, series No. 105, found margarine a most satisfactory food in an experimental diet of meat, margarine, vegetables, sugar, bread, and 1 pint of milk a day. This was the diet of a group of 41 boys during a period of several years. These boys gained an average of 6.93 pounds per boy and an average of 2.63 inches in height per boy per annum. The usual and normal average increase is often only from 3 to 5 pounds in weight and about 2 inches in height in a boy of the body weight of the boys in these experiments. The boys were in a fine state of health all through the years they were on this diet. "They were high spirited and irrepressible, being often in trouble on that account, and there was a complete absence of illness among them," says the report. The experiments upon these boys over a period of years were carried out "to help solve the problem of what diet in quantity and quality provides adequate nutrition for growing boys and girls." This diet of meat, vegetables, margarine, sugar, bread, and a pint of milk a day was all that could be desired in producing growth in weight and height, health, and "spirit" of the group of boys in the experiments. The oleomargarine used in these experiments was a grade known to contain the least amount of vitamin A of any grade on the market and selected for use because of this fact. It contained, according to the report on these experiments, only one-tenth as much of this vitamin as the best grade of butter.

In the light of all the scientific literature and experiments on the wholesomeness and food value of oleomargarine, is it not passing strange that there is so much antioleomargarine propaganda being circulated to prejudice the public and our representatives in legislative bodies against its use as a staple article of food?

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, House bill 489 has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. It appears more properly to deserve reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I ask for that change of reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be discharged from the further consideration of the bill referred to by him, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 3, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Still, still with Thee in the promise and the freshness of another day! Almighty God, Thou art altogether righteous and holy, and the passion of Thy heart is that Thy earthly children should be good. Thou dost summon us to bring our lives in unison with Thy will. Come, O Lord God of hosts, and may Thy fullest benediction be shed within these historic walls to-day. Grant that these servants of the Republic may be molded by the standards of Him who is the perfect model for all men. Do Thou walk with us, that we fail not nor turn aside. In our relations with the world of humanity, keep us away from the sustained hatred, which is the fertile soil of revenge and the spring of the insanity of war. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 935. An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) entitled "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. DALE and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Personnel Classification Board.

THE KIDNAPING OF THE LINDBERGH BABY

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to-day is Calendar Wednesday and the committees which have the call to-day are very anxious to dispose of all the business possible. While I shall not object to this request, I will be compelled to object to any further requests to consume any time to address the House, except the request to be made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, the country and the world was deeply shocked to receive last night news reports of the kidnaping of the son of Colonel Lindbergh. Coming from New Jersey, and being a neighbor and friend of the late Senator Morrow, who was the grandfather of this boy, I have been aroused beyond words. I understand from the Associated Press that an order has gone out to the Department of Justice from the President of the United States to cooperate with State and local authorities in every possible way to apprehend the kidnapers and return the infant to his parents.

I can think of no crime which tugs at the heartstrings and causes more anguish to a father and a mother than the kidnaping of a child. No punishment is too severe for fiends who will perpetrate such a crime. I am glad that the committee at this time has under consideration several kidnaping bills. I hope they will be reported to us soon, and I appeal to you as a parent and as a grandfather that when these bills come before the House they will receive support from all the Members, not only from New Jersey but from all the States. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEGER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As the author of the bill to which the gentleman refers, I wish to say that I am very much pleased to hear that the President of the United States has asked the Department of Justice to get busy on this case; but if the bill which I have introduced were enacted into law, it would be unnecessary for the President of the United States to ask the Department of Justice to get busy on this case. The purpose of my bill is to give the Government jurisdiction. The hearings last week disclosed a situation that is alarming and showed that local authorities were able to handle cases where the victim was not removed from the State, but where the person kidnaped was taken across the border the local police were helpless. I hope the Judiciary Committee will report the bill at the earliest date possible.

[Here the gavel fell.]

TEXAS

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, to Texans this is a significant day, and because of its historic interest, it is one of importance to American citizens in general. A few remarks concerning it seem doubly appropriate by reason of the fact that on this Calendar Wednesday the Committee on Military Affairs has the call. They are specially fitting also because occupying the chair as Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States is a Texan who is a worthy successor of those illustrious pioneers, concerning whose rugged character I desire to speak. [Applause.]

On March 2, 1836, a small band of men assembled in a rude unfinished building at Washington on the Brazos and declared their independence of Mexico. Texas had been attached governmentally to the State of Coahuila. It had suffered all the indignities that Santa Anna, self-styled Napoleon of the West, could thrust upon it. Those brave spirits who assembled in this rude building, with cotton cloth which only partially excluded the cold wind covering the openings which served as windows, hailed from practically every State in the American Union as the American Union then existed; not only from the South but from the Middle West, and from such States as Illinois and New York and Pennsylvania.

Shortly before this declaration the Alamo had fallen. Its story has not been properly told. There is to-day in the library of the capitol in Austin the original copy of the memorable letter sent by Travis from the Alamo in February, 1836. These were his words, and as you hear them, bear in mind that a little handful of brave Americans were trying to hold this fort against a horde of Mexican besiegers:

> Fellow citizens and compatriots, I am besieged by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna. I have sustained a continued bombardment for 24 hours and have not lost a man. The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion. Otherwise the garrison is to be put to the sword if the fort is taken. I have answered the summons with a cannon shot [applause], and our flag still waves proudly from the walls. I shall never surrender nor retreat. Then I call upon you in the name of liberty, of patriotism and everything dear to the American character to come to our aid with all dispatch. The enemy is receiving reinforcements daily, which no doubt will increase to three or four thousand in four or five days. Though this call may be neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible and to die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor and that of his country—victory or death! [Applause].

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. When we contemplate those stirring words and the subsequent deeds which attested their sincerity—for there every one of these brave Americans fell heroically in battle—it is enough to make our blood tingle with pride as it courses through our veins that we, too, are American citizens and that the stock from which we come suffered martyrdom that the principles of liberty we enjoy might not perish from the earth.

In April, 1836, on the 21st day, Gen. Sam Houston and his followers succeeded in establishing the independence of Texas in the historic Battle of San Jacinto. A republic was formed. It existed for nine years, from 1836 until 1845, when Texas was admitted to the Union. We had our Presidents; we had our Congress; we had our flag; and four foreign countries sent their representatives to the Republic of Texas. The old French Embassy, most of the material for which was brought from France, is still standing in the city of Austin.

I want to call it to your attention that in the entrancing history of our State every American may take pride. Sam Houston was born in Virginia and went to Texas from Tennessee, as did the great David Crockett. The Austins came originally from Pennsylvania.

Travis, who was in command at the Alamo, hailed from North Carolina, and the last President of the Republic of Texas, Anson Jones, who, in my judgment, perhaps had more to do with the annexation of Texas to the Union than any other man, came from Massachusetts. So you see that we Texans are historically a cosmopolitan people from the standpoint of Americanism; not provincial in our views and having as our fathers men from every point of the American compass.

To-day we are proud that we may add to the list of such illustrious names as Washington and Israel Putnam and Anthony Wayne those of the Austins and Houston and Travis and Crockett and Bowie and Lamar and scores of others.

And on this memorable day I am proud to stand in this place and rejoice with you that we have as our presiding officer a Texan in every way worthy of that rugged heroism and courage and character which marked the lives of these illustrious patriots who have done so much for American history and American liberty. [Applause.]

PARLIAMENTARY QUESTIONS

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARSONS. Yesterday afternoon the distinguished Congresswoman from Florida occupied the chair and in addressing the Chair I addressed her as Madam Chairman. I notice in the RECORD this morning, that it is printed as Mr. Chairman. I wish to inquire which one of the titles is correct.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, the gentleman from Illinois in addressing the chair as Madam Chairman used the correct form.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. On Saturday, during the consideration of the bill authorizing an appropriation for Federal-aid highway construction I offered an amendment which will be found on page 4889 of the RECORD, first column.

Far be it from me to attempt to qualify as a parliamentarian, but Members on both sides of the aisle have told me that in their opinion the decision of the Chair in declaring my amendment out of order is questionable. My amendment provided for an insertion to follow the committee amendment and was not offered as an amendment to the committee amendment. Just preceding the consideration of my amendment the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] offered an amendment to the same section. A point of order was made and the Chairman overruled the point of order. The point of order against my amendment was made by the gentleman from Mississippi on the ground that it involved labor and was subject to a point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] also had to do with labor.

Now, my amendment was an important amendment and it seems to me the ruling of the Chair should be carefully considered, and I also want to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that when I offered my amendment as a motion to recommit he sustained a point of order immediately, probably basing his ruling on the decision of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who occupied the chair while we were in Committee of the Whole.

I do not seek a ruling from the Chair at this time but I simply want to request that the parliamentarian go into this matter very thoroughly, because if the ruling of the Chair stands, in my opinion, after a committee amendment is offered to a section, under the ruling of the Chair Saturday, no other amendment can be considered in order to the particular section under consideration, unless submitted as a substitute to the committee amendment when that amendment is presented. The Speaker will realize I only seek to have this ruling carefully considered. I would not have made this request had not Members on both sides suggested that I call it to the attention of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the parliamentarian will take into consideration the gentleman's suggestion and prepare a ruling which will be inserted in the RECORD for future reference.

There was no objection.

REVISING REMARKS IN THE RECORD

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week, in the heat of debate and on the impulse of the moment, I made certain references to the great State of Massachusetts that I wish to expunge from the RECORD. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent to strike from the remarks made by me on that date the last two paragraphs of my statement. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I thank you for your consideration.

I am impulsive and impetuous. I suspect I am resentful, but may God forbid that I should ever be intolerant.

My remarks of last Thursday are not characteristic of me. I do not entertain any such feelings as those expressed for the State of Massachusetts.

Massachusetts and Georgia were sister Colonies for more than 40 years. They have been sister States nearly four times that long. Our people have much in common. There is glory enough for both States in the achievements of either Massachusetts or Georgia. The accomplishments of the people of either State are incalculable. We have had our family disputes, but on the whole our people have been friendly for two centuries.

I acknowledge for my people with deep appreciation the friendship of Massachusetts and the many evidences of the generosity of her people. My people have some interest in the history of Massachusetts. It was Georgia who sent to Massachusetts the powder that was used at Bunker Hill.

You may be surprised when I tell you that in 1917 I was a captain of Infantry and in command of a company of soldiers who had been sent to Camp Gordon, Ga., from Camp Dix, N. J., and that more than 50 per cent of the men in my company were natives of Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time, on my own motion, to publicly apologize to the State of Massachusetts and her wonderful people for the unkind remarks just referred to, which have been stricken from the RECORD, and which were never intended for the Commonwealth itself but only for one of her citizens, who, like myself, sometimes speaks too freely in heated debate. [Applause.]

GEORGE WASHINGTON

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

ATHENS.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C.:

On the occasion of the bicentennial of the birth of Washington, the great American liberator, I beg you to be the interpreter to the Congress and the people of the United States of the respectful admiration felt by the Hellenic Chamber for his noble memory. We can not forget that this illustrious champion of independence closed his career while desiring for his people concord and peace, toward which also our best wishes for all humanity, whose happiness is inseparable from the prosperity of the American people, are also directed at the present time.

SOFOULIS, President of the Chamber.

SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. PRESIDENT OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C.:

We have the honor to inform you that to-day, on the occasion of the bicentennial of George Washington, the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies of the Dominican Republic met as a national assembly, where were present the Honorable President of the Republic, Gen. Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina, the diplomatic corps, and high officials, to offer formal homage of admiration and gratitude to the memory of that illustrious leader of liberty. The president of the Senate and the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, Mr. Schoenfeld, delivered eulogies. The national assembly, on the happy initiative of the Hon. President Trujillo, and faithfully interpreting the sentiments of the Dominican people, expressed the desire that the Republic should associate itself in the most eloquent language to the universal homage which to-day is paid to the founder of the United States of America. His glory is the object of reverence for all humanity.

MARIO FERMIN CABRAL,
President of the Senate,
MIGUEL A. ROCA,
President of the Chamber of Deputies.

SESSIONS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—CRIMINAL CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit two unanimous-consent requests.

The first is that the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to sit during this week as much as required during sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, you, of course, have all seen in the morning papers the account of the great tragedy that has taken place in the family of an American citizen. It is no more important, of course, than if the humblest child from the humblest home in America had been taken. But it has served to center the interest of the Nation upon the conditions which obtain in America with reference to the terrorism of crime in this country.

There happens to be at this time pending before the Committee on the Judiciary a bill known as the kidnaping bill. I have asked the privilege of speaking for a few moments in order to do two things.

First, to give notice to this country that there is no legislation pending here that can deal adequately with this situation; that it is not a case or a crime with reference to which Uncle Sam can be depended upon to take care of the situation.

This transaction ought to make every man and woman in this country determine to clean up their own communities. [Applause.] Conditions are an absolute disgrace to this day and this generation, Members of the House; and every man and woman in their homes and on the street are made afraid, while a bunch of sentimentalists are weeping over these criminals.

Gentlemen, what we need is to have red blood in our veins and determine before God Almighty that we will make this country safe for decent people to live in. [Applause.] We have had too much consideration for the criminal in America. We have had enough of these sisters and sisterettes parading their sloppy sentimentality around while honest people live in dread of these human devils who superimpose their government, levying their tribute, murdering men and women and babies in this supposed to be land of the free and home of the brave.

We might as well know this, too, that as long as organized gangs of criminals are permitted to exist in this country, this sort of a crime is going to be committed, and Uncle Sam can not do the clean-up job. That is the word to be sent back to the people of the communities.

We have been jazzing along as a people and permitting to grow up in this country this supergovernment of criminals that levies a tribute on the people and threatens to burn out the eyes of their children if they do not come across. Think of it, while we strut around and celebrate the bicentennial of George Washington and our ancestors. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

CORRECTION

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction in the RECORD, in so far as I am able. Complaint has been made to me on two occasions that Monday, while I was presiding over the Committee of the Whole, I referred to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] as the gentleman from Massachusetts. It so appears in the RECORD. I have no recollection of having committed such an offense, but I take the blame, because I know that always the reporter is right. If every Member of the House will view the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] alongside the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], he might be excused if he got the reference a little mixed. [Laughter.]

GRANTING A RIGHT OF WAY TO THE GEORGIA HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees; and when the Committee on Military Affairs was reached—

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7788) authorizing the granting by the Secretary of War of a right of way to the Georgia Highway Department.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to the highway department of the State of Georgia a right of way for a public hard-surfaced road through a part of the uninclosed portion of the Government property embraced in the national cemetery reservation at Andersonville, Ga.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give us some explanation of the bill?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, the bill merely gives the Highway Commission of the State of Georgia permission to build a concrete highway through the uninclosed portion of the Andersonville National Cemetery, which is not used for burial purposes, in that part of the cemetery.

Mr. TILSON. The Andersonville Cemetery is no longer being used as a burying ground for additional dead, is it?

Mr. McSWAIN. No. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am the author of the bill. Andersonville is in my home county. It was the site of the prison during the War between the States. This is a Union cemetery. The cemetery proper is inclosed. The reservation also contains a part of the old territory which was the Confederate stockade, just back of the cemetery. The road now goes in front of the cemetery, about a fourth of a mile from the cemetery. Tourists passing do not have a free view to the cemetery. In addition to that, there are two or three very dangerous curving railroad crossings right at this place. The State highway department contemplates running the road to the rear of the cemetery, which does not enter the inclosed cemetery at all, but will make the cemetery accessible to through traffic and also bring it close to the old stockade and Providence Spring. The bill provides that the Secretary of War shall grant to the State of Georgia the right to construct this road through he uninclosed part of the property.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Cox). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McSWAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENALTY FOR SENDING A THREATENING LETTER THROUGH THE MAILS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to the fact that I introduced a companion bill to the kidnaping bill, which bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, making it a felony to send a threatening letter through the mails. Strange as it may seem to the membership, we have no such Federal statute at this time. I have just been called by the chairman of the committee and advised that the committee has favorably reported the bill this morning. Also, that they made two changes, one increasing the fine from $1,000 to $5,000, and the second increasing the penalty from 5 years to 20 years imprisonment.

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution for printing under the rule, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 164

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 110, authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed two hours—to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

MARKERS FOR CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 132) to authorize the Secretary of War to erect one marker for the graves of 15 Confederate soldiers killed in action and buried in the La Fayette Cemetery at La Fayette, Ga., in lieu of separate markers as now authorized by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the bill H. R. 132, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to erect one single marker at the grave in the La Fayette Cemetery at La Fayette, Ga., in which are buried 15 unknown Confederate soldiers killed in action in 1864, at a cost not exceeding the cost to be represented by 15 separate markers as now authorized by law.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves no expense to the Government. Some three years ago Congress passed a law authorizing the marking of unmarked graves of Confederate soldiers, thereby evidencing the fact that the time had arrived, spoken of by the poet, when good feeling between the North and the South has reached that point when it can be truthfully said that "They have banished our anger forever when they laurel the graves of our dead." Fifteen Confederate soldiers, killed in action, are buried in one plot in the La Fayette Cemetery at La Fayette, Ga. Under existing law one marker for each grave may be obtained. The markers cost approximately $6 each in that area. This bill simply proposes to allow the Quartermaster General to combine the cost of the 15 markers and erect one marker for the 15 graves, at a cost of approximately $90.

I apprehend there will be no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. I have no intention of attempting to take any powers away from the gentleman from South Carolina; but this bill, being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, is it not true that any Member who claims the floor under the regular 5-minute-rule procedure can gain the floor without permission of the gentleman from South Carolina? I just wish to have this matter made clear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Any Member offering an amendment is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Supplementing the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], and to show the necessity for such a bill as he proposes now pending before the committee, last fall a threatening letter was sent to one of my constituents, Mr. Mud Young, of Clyde, Tex., one of the prominent citizens of that community, notifying him that, unless he placed a certain amount of money at the corner of his field by a given time, his house would be burned and dire calamity would happen to his wife and children. He and a bunch of officers hid in that vicinity waiting for the thugs. They did not come. The next morning he got another letter through the mail telling him that they found out that he was watching for them with officers and they were getting tired fooling with him, and if he did not place the money at the designated place by that night, their threats would be carried out. He substituted a package of newspapers for money and placed it at the spot designated, and he and the officers stayed there until half past 3 o'clock that morning, when a big storm came up and they left and went home. The next morning the package was gone. He received another threatening letter telling him that they found out about his watching.

I sent those letters to the Department of Justice. They said they could not do anything with them because it was not a crime, unless the Post Office Department could handle it. I sent those letters to the Post Office Department and they informed me there was not any law to prevent the sending of that kind of threatening letter through the mail.

That is the state of facts as they exist at this time. I mention this to show you the necessity of such a bill as that proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I would like to inform the gentleman that the Post Office Committee held lengthy hearings last week on that bill, and I can promise the gentleman that in a short time we will have a bill before the House that will deal with this use of the United States mails by kidnapers.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and there should be a law making it a first-degree felony to send such a letter through the mails, carrying a penalty attached to it that would stop the writing of such letters.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Being a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that committee just reported a bill and it will be here in a short time. It provides a penalty of $5,000 fine——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it ought to have a penalty of death. There is nothing short of death that will stop this kind of threatening letters. The penalty should be death, and nothing less, and it should not be confinement in the penitentiary or a fine.

Mr. MOREHEAD. That was my suggestion, and I so stated in the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. We should amend that bill when it is brought on the floor and provide a death penalty that will stop such threats being sent through the mails, intimidating citizens all over the land. It so happens that this man was not afraid. It so happens that he had the help of good officers, but to-day he never knows when the assassin's knife is going to strike him in the back. They may strike a member of his family. While he is a brave man, he walks the streets with that apprehension in his heart all the time. There should be a death penalty that would stop it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. McSWAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 10022, Report No. 659) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD reserved all points of order.

REGULATING APPROPRIATIONS FOR MILITARY AND NONMILITARY ACTIVITIES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8330) regulating the use of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed an identical bill, S. 3514. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 3514) be substituted in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do it merely to ask the gentleman the question if the Senate bill is identical with the House bill?

Mr. McSWAIN. It is identical, word for word.

Mr. BLANTON. And just what does the bill propose to do?

Mr. McSWAIN. The bill proposes to regulate the provisions now carried in the appropriations bill, which restricts purchases by the War Department to American products, and it is in order to prevent a point of order lying against that appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no technical "Army" language in the bill that will grant promotions or increased pay or additional charges on the United States Treasury?

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean technical language that provides for additional benefits that Members can not understand.

Mr. McSWAIN. Oh, no; not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the expenditure of appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department, the Secretary of War shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. As the gentleman is aware, the Army practically runs the entire Canal Zone. They have a commissary department and a general store. But does the gentleman know that the Army stationed in the Canal Zone and Government employees there use hundreds of thousands of pounds of butter every year that is imported from Australia?

When the House added an amendment to the Army appropriation bill compelling the War Department to make all of its purchases within the continental United States, without any limitations, there was so much consternation in the department that they sent for the Governor of the Canal Zone. The House amendment was subsequently toned down and modified in conference. I talked with the governor about it. I talked with him again about it a year later and he confirmed the fact that every pound of butter that is consumed in the Canal Zone is purchased in Australia. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes this bill will give American dairy interests an opportunity to sell butter to the Canal Zone, because it is quite an item?

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is not this practically the same provision that was included in the War Department appropriation bill for this fiscal year?

Mr. McSWAIN. It is. It was carried in the appropriation bill without authority of law and this is to make it permanent law so that a point of order will not lie against such a provision in any future bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. The situation which the gentleman from New York has just described does not exist at the present time because of the provision that was carried in the War Department appropriation bill for this fiscal year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This provision is not sufficiently broad to cover the matter. I can assure the gentleman that General Burgess told me on his last visit that they were still purchasing all of their butter from Australia. They like it because it costs less.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is that the reason he gave for it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. There could not be any other reason, I am sure.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is purchased, I understand, by the Panama Railroad and not by the Army.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not care by whom it is purchased. We own the Panama Railroad. Let us get this clear and let us not becloud the issue. The Panama Railroad is owned, every bit of it, by the United States Government and operated by the Government. It is as much a part of the United States Goverhment as the War Department itself, and it does not look very well for that company, in order to save a fraction of a cent on a pound of butter, to go to Australia and purchase its butter. The butter is not only purchased abroad but it is carried in foreign bottoms from Australia to the Canal Zone.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Can the gentleman tell me whether the Panama Railroad is operated by the War Department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; it is operated by the Canal Zone government.

Mr. BACON. It ought to be included.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly it ought to be included.

Mr. BARBOUR. Let me say that I am just as much in favor of this as is the gentleman from New York, and I thought the matter was reached by the provision carried in the War Department appropriation bill for this year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that did not reach it. I am wondering whether the gentleman from South Carolina will agree to an amendment to the bill. I want to give our dairy interests an opportunity to sell butter to the Canal Zone, and I want to appeal to my colleague [Mr. TABER] to help me in that, because he represents dairy interests.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I will tell the gentleman what the situation is. I have the misfortune of being a director of the Panama Railroad. The Panama Railroad, under this provision, has not the legal authority to buy this stuff. This does not hit the Panama Railroad, the language not being broad enough to meet the situation. Whether an amendment can be placed in this bill which will reach it I do not know, but the present language is not broad enough to meet the situation in regard to the Panama Railroad.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. The situation is this: The Panama Railroad is a private corporation, all of the stock of which is owned by the Government. It is operated by a board selected by the Secretary of War. In order to reach that situation you would have to have broader language than you have at the present time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the operation of the Panama Railroad, the Government operates it under the fiction of a corporation, but all of the stock is owned by the Government.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have a Government agency, operated by the Government, but under the fiction of a corporation, whose stock is owned by the Government, purchasing supplies outside of the United States, whereas if the Panama Railroad Co. was operated directly by the Government of the United States the inhibitions of the proposed bill would be applicable.

I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], who has vast knowledge not only of the operations and affairs connected with the War Department but also the Navy Department, whether he knows of any other instrumentality which is similarly situated to the Panama Railroad Co., where the Government is operating an activity and the stock is owned by the Government?

Mr. TABER. The Merchant Fleet Corporation would be one and the Mississippi Barge Line Corporation would be another.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 4, after the word "Department," insert the following: "the Panama Railroad Co. or any other corporation whose stock is entirely owned by the United States Government."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. This is not done out of hostility to the purpose of the amendment, which is good; but the Committee on Military Affairs does not have jurisdiction of legislation relating to the Panama Canal.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If I limit it to the Panama Railroad Co. will the gentleman not urge his point of order?

Mr. McSWAIN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS] think this amendment is all right and will not defeat the purposes of the bill?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I think it is all right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would not be willing to subscribe to the general policy that the Fleet Corporation should be banned from purchasing any supplies not made in the United States. The appropriate committee of the Congress has not given any consideration to that phase of the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by having it read, after the word "Department," "and the Panama Railroad Co."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. The bill states "that in the expenditure of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department." The Panama Canal is included in that language, because that is carried among the nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right; but we have had that experience before. Let us now put in the Panama Railroad Co.

Mr. BARBOUR. All right; but it does not add anything.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have taken that chance for four years now and have been defeated.

I move to amend, Mr. Speaker, by inserting, after the words "War Department," the words "including the Panama Railroad Co."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 4, after the words "War Department," insert the words "including the Panama Railroad Co."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry.

I would like to inquire of some gentleman who knows whether or not the Panama Railroad Co. is operated out of appropriations made for the War Department?

Mr. TABER. It is not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then what is the necessity of putting in this amendment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama we have been trying to reach this situation for the last four or five years. Every year I am given assurance that the amendment offered to the appropriation bill will carry out the purpose, only to find out, after July 1, that it is not being carried out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from New York must be impressed with the proposition that it looks like a futile thing to undertake to put a limitation upon an appropriation that is not used at all for the purpose of operating the railroad company.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not see why the legislative provision is in the form of a limitation. It ought to be legislation that they shall not do this.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no interest in the world in the matter, but it seems to me it is rather irregular and unusual to seek to tack onto a bill something that is not at all germane to the limitations they are endeavoring to put on the appropriation. However, if it is acceptable to the members of the committee, it is all right with me.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition against the amendment.

If this amendment were drawn in such shape that it would meet the situation, I should not object to it, but the Panama Railroad is operated out of the funds that it receives for the transportation of property and out of the funds it receives from the sale of merchandise to the employees of the Canal Zone, and not out of appropriations.

The way they buy the butter is this: The Panama Railroad operates a number of stores for the convenience of the employees in the Canal Zone. It buys the butter to sell to the employees. None of the money used to buy the butter is received out of any money appropriated, or money that is carried in the War Department appropriation bill. Therefore, to add the words "Panama Railroad" would not affect the operations at all, and would not put the railroad in the position where it could do that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is quite right in what he says. The bill is drawn as if it were an amendment to an appropriation bill. It is inartistically drawn. When the gentleman says that the money that buys the butter is not appropriated I will say that every cent is, because we pay the salaries of the employees.

Mr. TABER. But the salaries are paid out of the revenues of the canal and not out of appropriations.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is not the only way to reach the desired result to amend the charter of the Panama Railroad Co.? The Panama Railroad is chartered under State law, and although now owned by the Government, it is operated under its charter just as any private enterprise is operated. The only difference is that the United States Government owns all the stock of the Panama Railroad Co.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words. There has been considerable complaint from all parts of this country that the War Department has been forced to buy matches from the Soviet Government. Under the provisions of this bill, will the War Department be able to buy American goods, even if the soviet trade agencies bid a lower price?

Mr. McSWAIN. That very fact called the attention of the House to this and prompted the amendment to the appropriation bill. The provision in the appropriation bill has served to prevent the purchase of matches from Soviet Russia or from any other country. I understand that the operation of this same law, which was in the appropriation bill last year, has had that effect. I am confirmed in that by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], who is on the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has taken up this matter with the Secretary of War. The language in the bill is that the Secretary of War——

Mr. FISH. I did some time ago, and the Secretary of War said that he could not do anything, because his hands were tied by Congress and that the War Department must buy goods from the lowest bidder and that he had no discretion. I hope the pending bill will pass and be enacted into law so that the War Department and other departments of the Government may give preference to American-made commodities.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I introduced a bill covering all the departments and the independent offices as well, and if that bill could be reported out it would cover corporations owned by the United States, and also all the departments, instead of having an amendment to every appropriation bill subject to a point of order. It is a blanket bill covering expenditures in all departments.

Mr. BACON. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. KAHN. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I want to say that one of the most glaring examples is the Veterans' Bureau. I have been struggling for the last few weeks to get the Veterans' Bureau to purchase only American goods. To bring this about I am informed that legislation will be necessary. General Hines, I believe, would favor such legislation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do they buy?

Mr. BACON. For all their hospitals they buy feathers for mattresses and pillows from China.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is an outrage.

Mr. BACON. I have been trying to get them to buy only American material for this purpose and adopt the same American standards and specifications that prevail in the Army and Navy.

Mrs. KAHN. I simply took the names from the Congressional Directory, under which they are listed. They are listed under the head of "Independent offices and establishments."

Mr. BACON. I hope the Veterans' Bureau will be included.

Mrs. KAHN. It is included.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the lady from California yield?

Mrs. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I call the lady's attention to the fact that the Army appropriation bill has not yet been reported. The bill under consideration has passed the Senate. If the House adopts this bill to-day and it can be signed and made a law, a point of order can not be raised to the proposition on the Army appropriation bill which is about to come up for consideration in the House. That is the idea in trying to get this bill through now.

Mrs. KAHN. I am not opposed to the bill; but I rose to say that if we could hurry up legislation on the bill I introduced it would do away with all these bills being necessary and would do away with all points of order raised against such provisions, because the bill is almost all-embracing.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me that my amendment is futile the way the bill is drawn. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

House bill 8330 was laid on the table.

EXTENDING HOSPITAL AND HOME FACILITIES TO CONFEDERATE VETERANS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4577) to extend hospital and home facilities to veterans of the Confederate Army and Navy, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the bill H. R. 4577, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. MARTIN, will kindly take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4577, with Mr. MARTIN of Oregon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who served in the military or naval forces of the Confederate States shall hereafter be admitted to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and to hospitals under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration on the same terms and conditions as honorably discharged officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the War between the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina in charge of the bill, Mr. McSWAIN, is entitled to one hour, and the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Goss, is entitled to one hour.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I was hopeful that I might be relieved of the embarrassment which my opposition to this bill might bring. Since the bill came up under unanimous consent, when I objected to it, I have talked with quite a number of men who represent States in the South. I find, very much to my gratification, that there is a general sentiment among those gentlemen in opposition to this bill. Of course, they find themselves, as I do, in an embarrassing position, because the purpose of the bill undoubtedly appeals to the sentiments and emotions of anyone; but they feel again, as I do, that they are sacrificing a record which has never been approached in the history of the world—a record which has extended over a period of 60 years and more, a record which has the admiration, I believe, of every descendant of every Southern soldier and of every veteran of the Confederate Army, that the States of the South, without Federal assistance, without help from outside of their own borders, have, ever since the War between the States, cared for their veterans.

I do not believe the people of the Southern States want to sell this heritage for a mess of pottage, for at the most this is only a friendly gesture on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, says:

> I can not help but be sympathetic toward these old soldiers in their declining years, but the policy involved in these proposed measures is one of such national policy that only the Congress can best decide its merits.

Then he says at best it could only be a gesture, because there are not beds enough at the present time in the bureau hospitals to take care of veterans of the World War and the Spanish War who are applying for hospitalization.

Unless some Member from the South wants to take the floor and help to preserve for all time this record of sacrifice of his people who will carry on just for a few years more that splendid service which they have rendered for so long a period of time, I am not going to be the goat. I am not going to appear as being opposed to my own people, because if they were living to-day I would have many relatives who would come under the provisions of this bill. It is my purpose, and only purpose, as I said before, which I emphasize now by repetition, to preserve this wonderfully proud record of devotion and courage for the Southland.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this bill is the child of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which, as we know, is an organization composed of veterans of the different wars in which our country has been engaged during the past 50 years or more. The membership of that organization is made up almost entirely of men from the North and from the West. Very few men from the South hold membership in the organization. The bill has the indorsement of Watson B. Miller, chairman of the rehabilitation committee of the American Legion. The Veterans' Administration, in reporting on the bill, has well said that the bill involves a policy which the Congress, and not some bureau, should determine, but that, so far as the administrative features of the bill are concerned, they can be satisfactorily carried out by the Veterans' Administration.

It is estimated by the Veterans' Administration that there are, perhaps, some 540 veterans who might seek admission to soldiers' homes or to hospitals. That estimate of 540 was made about a year ago. Since that time the ravages of death have depleted the number of veterans in this country some 20 per cent, and instead of 540 there would be to-day, approximately, 432.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The report does not state. Are any of these Confederate veterans now without hospital or domiciliary care?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I was about to come to that. Let me say in reply to the gentleman that I am advised by the president general of the Daughters of the Confederacy that in the State of Connecticut there is an old veteran and a small chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy in that State have been paying $18 a week for hospitalization for that veteran. Of course, the passage of the bill would make that veteran eligible for admission to a Government home or Government hospital.

I am also advised by the president general of the Daughters of the Confederacy that in California there is a small number of veterans in the Confederate Veterans' Home; that the number of these veterans to-day is so small that the maintenance and operation of this home constitute a very great burden for the small number cared for.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Are there not some Confederate homes in the Southern States?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, permit me to state that every Confederate State has had or has to-day a home for its veterans. It is not the thought of the authors of this bill that these veterans will be placed in Government homes or Government hospitals.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Suppose this bill is passed, of course, all the veterans now occupying Confederate homes in the South would be eligible to admission under this bill?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is correct.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it the purpose to follow this up and ask the Government to take over these Confederate homes in the Southern States?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I would say absolutely not.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That would be almost the logical conclusion, would it not?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; I think not. I want to say in reply to the question by the gentleman from Indiana and in reply to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said that the people of the South are very proud of the way in which they have taken care of their veterans. We have taken care of these veterans in many instances at great sacrifice to ourselves, and we would do nothing or ask nothing that we felt would in any way mar the record of the past.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. In reading the letter from Mr. Hines, Administrator of the Veterans' Bureau, I take it from the report on page 3, in the first section, that if this bill is pass it will be necessary to provide some additional beds to take care of these soldiers, because there is none available at the present time.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think not, for this reason: The evidence before our committee and the information we received convinced us that there would be very few of these veterans who would avail themselves of this privilege if it were granted. Permit me to say to the gentleman from New York that a soldier who at the age of 18 years entered the war during the last year, 1865, would to-day be 85 years of age. These veterans are practically all gone, and it is only a matter of taking care of a very few in States like Connecticut or California, or some of the Northern States, where there are no homes and no facilities.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The thought might be projected that the veteran in Connecticut should go to Alabama. He would doubtless be welcomed to the home in Alabama, but he no doubt has family ties and other ties in Connecticut that would cause him to hesitate to go so far away from those ties.

Mr. SNELL. Are there any records to show how many there really are? Of course, there are no Government records. At the present time if we place a Union soldier in a hospital we look up the records. Where would we go to get any record to prove that any man who claimed the right to go was really entitled to it?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There are a great many of those records in the office of The Adjutant General here in Washington. In addition thereto the States have their records.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says there is evidence that there are very few of them, but here is the record of the administrator, Mr. Hines, who says it will be necessary, if we pass this bill, to have additional beds to take care of them, because there is none available at the present time.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If the gentleman will notice the language, General Hines says, "Who might require." I emphasize the use of the word "might" and the fact that he has estimated on the basis of all the veterans who might be available for this relief.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman not imagine that a great many of them will take advantage of this if it is passed?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not, because nearly all of those who need domiciliary care are in homes operated by the several States.

Mr. SNELL. What is going to be the feeling of the Union soldiers when we put these Confederate soldiers in the same homes with them?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In reply to that I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I can not but believe that whatever feeling might have existed in the past and whatever bitterness might have existed—and, of course, those feelings and that bitterness were mutual—have disappeared. I think we all realize that we are now one great people and that the soldiers of the North appreciate that fact as much as we of the present generation.

Mr. SNELL. Information came to me a while ago that a short time ago they had a parade somewhere and the Union soldiers did not want to march with the Confederate soldiers who carried the Confederate flag. Is that so?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SNELL. I would be willing to provide a hospital or Confederate home for them, if necessary, but I think it would be a mistake to put them together at this time, and I say that with all friendliness to the North and to the South.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. May I say to the gentleman that on Confederate Memorial Day Union soldiers often ride in parades and take part in memorial exercises side by side with Confederate soldiers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I did not know this bill was pending until a moment ago and the gentleman may have already covered my query. Has the gentleman any information that the Confederate soldiers want this kind of legislation?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. My information comes from the president general of the Daughters of the Confederacy.

Mr. BYRNS. I am talking about the soldiers themselves. They have their organization and they meet regularly, as the gentleman knows, and I would like to know whether or not they want this legislation, because they are the ones to whom it applies.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In reply to the gentleman I will say I am not aware that the Confederate veterans' organization has taken any action one way or the other, but I do know that the Daughters of the Confederacy, which, as the gentleman knows, is an auxiliary, in a way, of the Confederate veterans' organization, are very strong for the passage of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman does not need to be told that I am devoted to the Confederate soldier. A number of my family were engaged on the side of the Confederacy, and the man for whom I am named was killed in the war, but I was told by very prominent Confederate soldiers in Nashville when the subject of pension legislation was up they were bitterly opposed to it. They said they did not want any such legislation, and that is the reason I have asked these questions.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I wonder if the gentleman was present in the Chamber when I stated it was the thought that this bill would take care of those Confederate soldiers who to-day are in Northern States, where there are no Confederate homes.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say that in my State we have a Confederate home. There are not many in it now, I am very sorry to say, because they are dying very rapidly. But we have a splendid Confederate home with 400 acres of fine grounds around it. It is near the city of Nashville, and in close proximity to the Hermitage, and there we take care of the Confederate soldiers, not only when they need medical relief but when they need support. We take care of them during their declining years, and the State of Tennessee does not ask the Federal Government to take care of its own heroes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I will say we have a Confederate home in Alabama, and Alabama does not ask the Federal Government to take care of its heroes.

Mr. BYRNS. Has the gentleman any expression from the commander in chief of the Confederate organization to the effect that he would like to have this bill passed?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I have not, except the sentiments conveyed to me through the president general of the Daughters of the Confederacy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that since I made my objection to the consideration of this bill and stated my reasons therefor I have received a large number of letters from Confederate veterans and from ladies connected with the woman's auxiliary. With one or two exceptions, every one of them supported the position I took on the floor of the House. Furthermore, may I say that in my own city up to two years ago we had a Confederate veteran and for 10 years previous to his passing away the people in my own city, including the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Grand Army of the Republic, treated him with the same consideration that any Union veteran received. In many of the States where there are more than one or two Confederate veterans and no Confederate home, I have learned they have treated them the same as they have treated Union soldiers. I find that the support of the South is almost universal in reference to the position I have taken in the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman stated the purpose of this bill is to take care of the few Confederate veterans who may be in Northern States that do not have Confederate veterans' homes. Would the gentleman accept an amendment to the bill, providing that this shall not apply to residents of States that maintain homes for Confederate veterans?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not know that I see any particular objection to that amendment, and yet if you are going to give it to one, why not give it to all. Besides the thought of the few veterans who might be taken care of, it was also the thought of the committee that this was a fine and a gracious gesture that would show to the country and to the world that any feeling left from the conflict of 1861–1865 is at an end; that we, the people of the United States, have reached that point in our history when we can look upon that conflict with the same feeling that the people of England look upon the War of the Roses.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska, I can see that there might be a situation where some home may not have but one occupant left, with a very great overhead, and under those conditions it might be that the veteran himself, as well as those in charge of the home, might want to ask for the relief given in this bill. Of course, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska would preclude this.

I can not overemphasize that, after all, the dominant thought behind this bill, and the dominant thought behind the committee in reporting the bill, is that it is a fine gesture; that we, as a people, are proud of the valor and the heroism and the sacrifices of the soldiers of 1861–1865, irrespective of which side they fought on, and that the daring deeds and wonderful self-abnegation of these soldiers is a common heritage.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me if we are going to go as far as the gentleman asks in this bill, we ought to have at least consulted the commanders on both sides. If it is a proposition, as the gentleman says, only a gracious gesture and, as the gentleman says, he does not know what the commander of the Department of the South wants or what the commander of the Department of the North wants, it seems to me it would have been fair to have taken that question up, if it is simply a gracious gesture. If it is a matter of transferring all these men and putting them in another place, that is another proposition, because that would involve considerable expense to the country.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Let me say to the gentleman that I have no direct word myself from the commander of the Confederate Veterans' organization as to this bill, but I have been advised by the president general of the Daughters of the Confederacy that not only does that organization, which is the auxiliary of the men's organization, want the bill but that the Confederates themselves want it.

Mr. SNELL. Then, it is more a matter of need and of fact than just a gesture.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I would say it is both. I would say that it is a gesture and would, perhaps, meet some need.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How many former Confederate soldiers are there at present in the Confederate hospitals in the Southern States?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I have no compilation of those figures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Several thousand?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Oh, no; nothing like that. I was at the Confederate home in the State of Alabama last summer, and there were about five or six at that time. There are very few. They are all gone.

Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, to me this is a most embarrassing bill and creates a most embarrassing situation.

We down in my part of the country have always felt it was our duty to take care of the Confederate soldier [applause] and this we have always done [applause] and this we always will do, with love and kindness and tenderness, as long as there is a dependent one there. [Applause.]

We do not believe that the Confederate soldiers, the few of them that are yet living and who may need the help of the Government, would desire that the Congress of the United States invite them into any home except the ones that the legislatures in our States provide for them.

I hope and trust, therefore, that to keep down an embarrassing vote here—and, of course, I shall vote against this bill if it comes to a vote—that the bill will be withdrawn. I would like very much to see the committee in charge of the bill do this. I believe if they did, they would express the views and the feelings of 99 per cent of the living Confederate soldiers and 99 per cent of their descendants. I hope, therefore, they will withdraw this bill and not have it here for consideration. [Applause.]

We love the Union, we are glad we are in the Union, and our fathers, before they mingled with the dust, were glad also, 99 per cent of them, that the difficulties between the North and the South were settled and that we were again a united country, with one aim, and one purpose, and that to uphold the glory and the dignity and the perpetuity of this, the greatest Government upon the face of the earth.

We do not need, and a vast majority of us do not want at this hour, anything from the Federal Government that would make it appear that we are not willing to take care of the graves of our dead or the bodies of our living. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the statement by the gentleman from Texas that we do not wish any help from the Government for the care of the graves of our dead, I want to say that the Federal Government is already, by act of Congress, marking the graves of Confederate soldiers, and Members from the South who are opposing this bill have been most active in securing the markers.

If, however, there has been one thing that the people of the South and their Representatives have been united on, have been all of one accord on, it is the matter of the care and attention given to the Confederate soldiers; it is the love and affection which the people of the South have held for those soldiers. I have no disposition to divide the people of the South or their Representatives by a bill of this kind. Surely I would deplore anything that might do that.

Under the circumstances, since there is such a wide divergence of opinion among the Representatives from the South, among the Representatives of the people who would be affected by this bill, if there is no objection from other members of the committee, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the bill be withdrawn for the present. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MARTIN of Oregon, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4577 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the sentiment so well expressed by the gentleman from Alabama in Committee of the Whole, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs for further consideration.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address delivered in my district on George Washington by my colleague, Mr. HAINES.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered in my district on George Washington by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. HAINES]:

The people of the United States have decided that for the next nine months they will pay honor to the memory of the greatest man this, or perhaps any other, nation has produced. This will be a great year, 200 years since the birth of George Washington, and the year that will go down in history as one in which a great nation, with a great people, will gather in their respective communities to render to the greatest of this Nation's men a tribute such as no other figure in our American national life has or may ever receive. It is to be a new kind of a tribute—a tribute to a man who ushered in new ways to advance the cause of humanity.

The history of nations reveals great characters, reveals strong personalities who have made great contributions to their people—indeed, have made great nations—and these have had their honor. Unfortunately, too often the nations they founded were built on the wreckage of others and the honors they received were tinged with regret for those they had ruined. The tribute we are to bestow upon a great character this year we Americans will render with no regrets, because it is distinguished in history, by the fact it is to be one of reverence and affection of honor and gratitude, untainted by such regrets. The man we honor conquered nothing but oppression. He wrecked nothing but political wrongs. He did not injure any other people, but he built here the greatest democracy ever assembled. We can search his deeds as we will, we can explore his character as we will, or however we may, and we can find no flaw in either. Here is a man who had nothing but goodness to give and he gave it all. Out of all his wisdom and goodness that he so willingly bestowed upon this great Nation of ours has grown this America—this fair land, the home of the brave and the free, a pattern for all other lands to develop their democracies. I am speaking of George Washington, the first American, the father of the land we love—patriot, statesman, philanthropist, Christian gentleman. It was this man who by his own patriotism, sacrifice, and suffering made possible a nation that was first to open up freedom of opportunity to every human being.

That is the man we honor this year and in honoring him we honor ourselves, for we are of his stock, if you please, and his having lived and sacrificed has handed to you and to me a heritage unsoiled and which should be sacred and inspire within each one of us a holy ambition and desire to hand to our posterity an even greater nation—a nation that might always stand for those fine principles that characterized this great man. While George Washington lived he was honored as no other American has ever been honored, then or since. Virginia gave us this great man—and yet he was a part of all this section of the United States. Indeed, if one had the time to delve into the facts as history reveals concerning this man, one would learn that he had much to do with Maryland and Pennsylvania, particularly in western Pennsylvania, where he went as a boy 16 years of age and early in life revealed those characteristics that were to stamp him as the great man he really was.

Reared in the home of honest people, accustomed to hardship, appreciating the hardships of honest labor, bearing the inconveniences of his day with fortitude and great courage, acquainted with the vast extent of territory and very early in life appreciating its possibilities for development, he chose to learn much about this territory, and, as a result, he spent much of his time away from his own fireside. Time will not permit me to dwell upon the early life of this wonderful man, but I would recommend that each one of you learn all you can about the youth of George Washington and the contribution he made when but a mere boy.

Learn of the great part he played in keeping the English-speaking race in that great country west of the Alleghenies and the value of his services to the early settlers and to the Army of Great Britain in that great conflict for supremacy in western Pennsylvania and Maryland, much of which has had a distinct bearing upon the history and geography of the United States. That, too, is another subject, and I suggest that you learn all you can about George Washington as a young man and then learn to appreciate youth more perhaps than before. Born 200 years ago, honored and revered, I say, as no other American, and if there is any change in George Washington's place in the respect and affection of the American people, his position is higher than ever. That, my friends, is some indication of George Washington's undying influence, his immortal and merited fame. We have every reason of feeling proud for having given this great name to the world, a name that will live forever, and in the two hundredth anniversary it is hoped that we will inculcate in the minds of the youth of to-day those fine principles of morality, courage, and patriotism for which George Washington stood, indeed, for which he was willing to give his all, and if we do nothing more this year than to hand to the present generation a better understanding of this great soul, we have done something which money can never give. In our ambitions as a people, in our aspirations for the success of this great Nation of ours, I am fearful we have gotten away from the many fundamentals for which George Washington was willing to lay down his life, for, after all, my friends, did not he lead his band of patriots, footsore, hungry, and ragged, over the rivers, at Valley Forge, Brandywine, and elsewhere during the most terrible suffering and at tremendous cost, not that wealth might be granted to his people, but rather liberty, freedom, representative government, without which we as a Nation will lose the greatness that has been ours during all the years of the past since this man. Is it any wonder, then, that we have the instincts of a national pride that we have given the world this wonderful man and that we want to honor and remember him?

This, then, my friends, should lead us to a self-examination.

There never was a time in the history of our Nation when that self-examination was more necessary than now to see if we still observe his counsels, to see if our America is to be immortal, as Washington built it and wanted it to be. Our hearts must be stirred as we think of this, and I think that still another motive should stir our hearts. That motive should be a great national resolution that each one of us should want to turn back again to Washington, to refresh ourselves anew at the fount of his patriotism, to learn again from his counsels, to be guided again by his principles, to forget our selfishness and think once again, thinking more of our country, as he did, for to him his country meant everything.

I often hear of men wanting to die for their country, but I would much prefer to have men want to live for their country, so to live that by the example they set they not only contribute to a more stable and sound country but hand down to our posterity a name of which no one need be ashamed. Oh, how I wish, my friends, on this two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth that it might be an occasion of a great national determination that America shall be immortal, as he meant it to be. When Congress determined seven years ago that the two hundredth anniversary of this man was to be celebrated throughout the Nation and not in any one place, city, or community, but that the celebration should be taken to the people themselves, not only in the United States but throughout the world as well, in the creation of the Bicentennial Commission, the thought in mind was to lead the people in preparing this celebration so that future generations of Americans may live according to the example and the precepts of his exalted life and character, and thus perpetuate the American Republic; and God grant that this alone may be the purpose and object of every such celebration held throughout the Nation.

This celebration is held in his honor and for no other purpose; to have the hearts of a grateful people go back to his memory in a great spiritual pilgrimage in a new and more vivid sense of his having lived and thought and wrought. If we fail in this the celebration will not have served its purpose, so that I plead with every American whom I am privileged to address upon such occasions to have in mind only the honor we owe to the name of George Washington and in honoring him thus to permit nothing of a commercial nature for the benefit of selfish individuals, which unfortunately we have with us in this day. The commission has permitted nothing of this character to enter the celebration, and for the information of you dear friends let me say that the greatest care and investigation had to be exercised so as to prevent commercial interests making a great carnival or some such celebration of a lower plane. We do not want this in the two-hundredth anniversary of George Washington. To you and to me it should be a more sacred celebration than any this Nation has ever observed. The commission has performed the most valuable service possible in giving us correct history of this great man. In the past we have taken him to be a cold marble figure. Let us, if possible, remove that marble figure from the pedestal upon which it has so long rested and breath in that marble figure the soul of one of the greatest men that ever lived. For more than a year the commission has had historians explore every fact of his life and facet of his character. As a result thousands of magazines and newspapers over the country, in brief and interesting articles, have printed historical facts of this great man unknown before. The radio has contributed much in having our generation acclaim him as one of the world's greatest. The most children have been taught about this man is that he was the first President of the United States and that he led the Continental Army and cut down a cherry tree and that he never told a lie. To our everlasting shame let it be said that in the past historians have had the lack of good common sense to omit much of the latter, because, my friends, George Washington was like most boys of his own day, but having the advantage of a good mother and good home training. With all the printed matter, we might call this year's reading the largest class of history ever taught by anyone, as well as the greatest history lesson.

We do want it to be said that George Washington is the best known of our great men. Through all of this we are learning that he was a real, typical American, warm-blooded, warm-hearted—sometimes, I am glad to say, hot-tempered—but withal, the lover of his friends and by them adored; a devoted husband, a firm believer in the church, a giver to every good and charitable cause, and so open and friendly in his hospitality that it was said of his house that it was "like a favored tavern." In other words, we have learned that he was just like the rest of other good Americans who are noble in character and interested in his fellows and that he, too, had the same experiences that many others of us have had or have sometime or other in life, so that to be more like him should be the ambition of every father and mother to have inculcated in the mind of a growing son. I say this, my friends, because I know the hope of the United States depends upon the kind of homes you and I establish and the manner of our living before our most priceless possessions, our children.

If we know George Washington better we can draw nearer to him and understand the characteristics that made him great which surely will be to our everlasting profit. We can not hope to be as great as he was, but we can be inspired by his greatness to build better lives in ourselves and thus set an example before those whom God has given to us that will mean a better and greater nation. It is said that monarchies fall because of poverty and that republics crumple because of wealth. George Washington was not a wealthy man, notwithstanding the fact that he was a holder of much real estate—indeed, before 21 years of age, one of the largest holders of land in the colonies. He was usually hard pressed for money, but his liberality knew no bounds to those whom he believed in.

This Republic, the greatest of all time, is very wealthy and in that great wealth may lie a great curse unless we are wise in the use of that wealth. Isn't it beyond comprehension that men and women are on the verge of hunger and in much want throughout our great land to-day while granaries are almost bursting and we have much of the real wealth of the world. There is something really wrong in this land of ours, and in such time as this I wish we had the counsels of a man like Washington. I am glad, however, that we have so many fine characters in every community who will not see their neighbors go hungry, and I am sure no community will permit this to exist if the facts are known. George Washington was born in a typical American farmhouse of the time. Since then we have traveled far and fast. Only about a century after the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers he came on the scenes of life and now 200 years later we experience so many changes that to begin to enumerate would mean little, as it is so well known. I might remark, though, that in the time between the landing of the Pilgrims and the birth of Washington there was little advancement made in the manner of living.

If Washington were to return now, I am certain he would be amazed to see the complexities of our modern life compared with the life he led, and I am equally confident that he would approve all the advancements we have made in every field of our endeavor to bring new comforts to life. I am sure our vast commercial development would delight him, for much of it he foresaw and much of it he planned and prepared. It was he who saw the great opportunities west of the Alleghenies, and it was he who became intensely interested in having good roads built across the mountains into the region, and this has had much to do with keeping the people of the white race and of the English-speaking language in supremacy. It is for us to question, however, whether he would approve the spirit and the heart that is in this fair land of ours at present. It is for us to turn back and compare ourselves with the man born 200 years ago, to give all that he had and all that he was to the making of this country we now enjoy. God grant that we may have more men like him and especially at this period of our national life. I believe that there are millions of Americans for whom such comparison would mean neither fear nor shame. I believe that the vast majority of my fellow Americans are sound at the core or else this Nation would not have endured these 200 years. It is not in dread that we need to bring up Washington's exalted memory, his lofty example, but rather we can turn to him only with love and gratitude and understanding as to one who was as modern as ourselves. How I wish that greed and selfishness might be banished; how I wish that the spirit that characterized this great patriot might burn in the breast of every American. The real and deep significance of this day, it seems to me, is that it permits us to turn back and feel kinship, a spiritual oneness, with the first and greatest of all Americans.

The Nation has at last restored George Washington's birthplace as a part of the celebration in his honor. In the course of time millions of Americans will journey to this place and smile to think of our greatest man born in a place so like thousands of simple cottages to-day. As they go to this old farm place they will think of George Washington as a boy, left comparatively poor by the premature death of his father, denied the schooling that the humblest boy of to-day enjoys, and facing the prospect of earning his own living and perhaps providing for his family. And again I say how like so many other Americans, and then again we feel a kinship to him.

These were handicaps that he overcame and triumphs that every other American can overcome more easily knowing this. The same opportunities, the same discouragements, the same triumphs were his as are yours and mine to-day, and it was only after George Washington triumphed over his handicaps that he grew in strength, which is as true to-day as it was then. No man will ever be as great as this man, but we can all try and imitate his courage, his fearless facing of danger and threatened defeat and, above all, his modesty in victory. George Washington might have been called the wealthiest man of his time, as we would count wealth to-day, and yet he was always hard pressed for cash. In this many of us are like him. He knew what it meant to ask a little more time from his creditors.

Though he was elected President of the United States, before he could enter office he had to borrow a considerable sum of money to meet his impending expenses. He knew, too, what it meant to be behind in the payment of his taxes. In fact, the same problems that face business men to-day faced him. He was one of the most progressive farmers of his day, and yet he knew what it was to suffer drought and the loss of his crops. He knew what it was to be defeated for public office, because he was not successful in his first attempt.

All his life he regretted that he had no better education and he reproached himself for what he called a deficiency in his education. On the field of battle he tasted defeat many times, indeed he had victory very seldom. No great commander of an army ever won so few battles. He knew what it was for his friends to desert him, for he lived in a time when a great many of his influential friends deserted him and tried to hinder the success of his army. During the Revolution rival generals tried to displace him, and in our own city of York was frustrated a plan to take the army away from him in one of the most dastardly of all betrayals. In fact, every one of us, no matter how bitterly life may have been to us, but that might have Washington shake hands with us and say, "Brother, I know you and your troubles." We have all been through the same experiences, and yet in our knowledge of Washington we have little appreciated or known these facts. He loved children as we love ours and was not surpassed in his love for his mother. He experienced the same boyish infatuation for girls that most boys of 17 experience. He was kind and magnanimous to his enemies, and so is many another American to-day.

He loved the theater, loved to dance, loved the outdoors and sports, fond of athletics, loved to fish and to hunt, very fond of horses and horse racing, and did not object to taking a game of chance. Just like the rest of the average Americans to-day, and yet in our thought of this wonderful man we have never thought of these things in his life. Men are great because of their simplicity and not because of any superiority. God has created us all alike; it is what we do with ourselves that counts. If you would be great, you must be humble. The Man of Galilee taught this 2,000 years ago, as centuries before Him the writer of Proverbs observed.

Washington loved the Scriptures and had implicit faith in God's word. How applicable this could be to many who would be great.

He was just as simple and homely in these traits as any other American to-day. We have had so many false impressions of this man that we have been unfamiliar with him, and only one thing will ever continue to keep us at a respectful distance from him, and that is his greatness. No one would call him a genius in any direction.

As a thinker Benjamin Franklin outshone him. Other men wrote the Constitution of the United States and not George Washington. As President of the United States he leaned for advice on men who did have claim to genius in one or the other direction. What, then, was the true secret of his greatness. Just the simple, homely traits of judgment and sense that is in us all, and he built them into greatness by the force of his own character and the nobility of his soul. It leaves him differing with us in degree but not in kind. He may be the greatest of all Americans, but he remains to us the most typical of Americans, a man far taller than we, yet like us all. Two centuries have only added to his stature and to our knowledge of the humaneness within him. This is the kind of a man whose birthday all America—yes; all the world—will celebrate this year. We find him a man whom we would not fear to draw unto, and that, after all, is what the celebration is for. We want to draw nearer this man, to know him better, to know the true greatness of his soul, so that we might dedicate ourselves anew to his teachings and to the example and precept of his exalted life, to perpetuate the American Republic.

The story of his life will be told by countless thousands, in church, school, in the shop, on the streets, on the printed page, but it will be told by a grateful people who realize they can never repay by any honor they may bestow two centuries after his birth, but whose loyalty will grow as the years multiply for the land of Washington. Some will judge or appraise him as a military leader, but to me he is the man who loved children, the man who literally begged clothing and food for a starving and naked army; the man whose heart was so big it embraced all of the America you and I now know and which he visualized. When we visit Mount Vernon, and move among the trees and garden he planted and loved, we can almost hear the footfalls of that George Washington. He seems so near that if we spoke we should expect to hear the sound of his voice in answer. The scholar may go to him for his statecraft, the military expert may study his battles. the historian may trace all the dates of his life, but let the rest of us thank heaven for the other, the real Washington, the human Washington to whom we can go in spirit and have him say to us in the secrecy of our own hearts:

Love your country; be faithful to her institutions; forget your petty and selfish aims; live for the good of all your people; let the spirit that led your forefathers lead you; help keep this Nation safe forever. Let us be true to this Nation, my fellow citizens.

Let us have respect for its laws; let us have faith in those who are in authority and be true to the flag. When I say flag, I do not mean the material or color of its make-up, but what it stands for; and it does stand for all that is great in the life of George Washington. There must be no divided allegiance in this country.

"Any man who says he is an American but something else also, isn't an American at all. We have room for but one flag, and this excludes the red flag which symbolizes all wars against liberty and civilization just as much as it excludes the foreign flag of a nation to which we are hostile. We have room for but one language here, and that is the English language, for we intend to see that the crucible turns our people out as Americans of American nationality, of the lineage of Washington, and not as dwellers in a polyglot boarding house." And we have room for one soul loyalty, and that is loyalty to the people of Washington—our American people. God give us the spirit of Washington, the father of the land we love.

APPOINTMENT AS ENSIGNS IN THE LINE OF THE NAVY OF ALL MIDSHIPMEN WHO GRADUATE FROM THE NAVAL ACADEMY IN 1932

The Clerk resumed the call of committees.

When the Committee on Naval Affairs was reached—

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8083, providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MARTIN of Oregon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932: Provided, That the number of such officers so appointed shall, while in excess of the total authorized number of line officers, be considered in excess of the number of officers in the grade of ensign as determined by any computation.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask the chairman how much time for general debate there will be on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides for two hours, one hour for those in favor and one hour for those against.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not anxious to control the hour in opposition. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there is no member of the committee opposed, I ask to control the hour in opposition.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, there is no member of the committee opposed to the bill, so it is agreeable that the gentleman from Wisconsin may control the hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin to control the hour in opposition to the bill. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] for one hour.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I trust that I may have your attention while I endeavor to explain the objects of this bill. The bill proposes to commission the graduating class at the Naval Academy at the end of this year. The reason it is necessary to have a bill of this kind is because of the law covering such matters. Under the law to-day we are entitled to have only 4 per cent of the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy as officers. There is an authorized enlistment in the Navy to-day of 137,485 men. The officer strength is based on the authorized enlistment and that is fixed at 4 per cent. Four per cent of the authorized enlistment is 5,499. We have that number of officers in the Navy to-day. Therefore it is necessary to pass a bill of this kind before commissions can be issued to the 261 midshipmen who will graduate in June. The 4 per cent of the authorized enlistment was enacted in 1916, and the military reason why it was fixed at 4 per cent is that the type of ships in the Navy at that time were battleships and battle cruisers, and that we did not need to have as many officers then as is necessary to-day, because on account of the London treaty and the Washington treaty we have practically scrapped all of our battleships. We have to-day only 15 battleships and no battle cruisers. When this law fixing 4 per cent was enacted we had 21 battleships that we scrapped in addition to 11 that were being built. The Navy to-day is composed of what is known as small auxiliary craft, such as submarines, destroyers, cruisers, and aviation. In 1916, when we passed this law providing 4 per cent, aviation was in its infancy, so it will be seen that the Navy has changed. No longer have we large battleships and battle cruisers, and it requires more officers to man smaller ships than larger ships. That is the military reason. These boys at the academy will finish their course in June. Some 261 will be entitled to receive commissions, and if we do not pass this legislation they go out of the service into civilian life, and under the law it is necessary to pay them $720 each. It will be seen that on this fiscal year there will be a saving of $162,000 by passing this legislation at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman entirely frank in saying that?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I had not finished. If the gentleman will give me time, I shall finish.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what we would have to pay them to let them go back to private life, but if we keep them on, as the gentleman proposes to do by this bill, we will have to pay them their salaries for all time, which will cost $480,000 for this year and much more each year thereafter.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I was coming to that. If we keep them, it will cost $480,000 a year, beginning with the next fiscal year, but as a matter of fact under this fiscal year ending in June, there will be a saving of $162,000, because otherwise you would have to pay $200,000 and some-odd on the 2d day of June, when you discharge them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman correctly states that our authorized strength is 137,485 men. What is our actual strength, authorized and unauthorized, to-day?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There are about 79,000 men in the Navy to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. There are 79,000 men in the Navy, and when the law authorizes only 4 per cent officers, we should have only 3,160 officers for 79,000 men, but instead we have now, on January 1, 1932, not the 5,499 officers, or 4 per cent of the full authorized enlistment of 137,485 men, but on January 1 last we actually had 5,578 officers for only 79,000 men, when we should have only 3,160 officers, which is 4 per cent of 79,000 men. Thus we have now 2,418 more naval officers than the law allows, for it allows only 4 per cent of 79,000 men.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct, as to 79,000 men.

Mr. BLANTON. Which is way beyond the authorized officer strength of the Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, the gentleman confuses himself. We have 79,000 men in the Navy. The officer strength is not based on 79,000 men. It is based on 137,485 men, and that is fixed by statute at only 4 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, if we had 137,485 men in the Navy, we could have only 5,499 officers.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. But instead of having 137,485 men we have only about 79,000 men, and yet have 5,578 officers, when we are entitled to only 3,160 officers on a 4 per cent basis.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; we have in the Navy about 6 per cent or 6½ per cent of the actual enlistment in officers.

Mr. BLANTON. Which is 2½ per cent more than is authorized by law.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not 4 per cent authorized?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it is 2½ per cent more?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; the gentleman from Texas confuses. There is that actual enlistment.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking in technical naval language but I am talking in ordinary United States, which the ordinary person understands. The best speech that I ever heard the gentleman from Georgia make on this floor he made 12 years ago when he was condemning the land-lubber officers in the Navy—the officers on land who never saw water and who never saw the ships. That is the best speech the gentleman ever made on the floor, and I would like to have him permit me read a portion of that speech.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Did the gentleman agree with me then?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and I still agree with that position then taken.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If the gentleman will sit down and not take any more of my time, I think I can convince him as to the wisdom of supporting this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. YON. The present administration of the Navy with a great number of ships now being used, small line ships, demands more officers?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes. Of course, we require more officers to man a navy of smaller-type ships.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This bill is to permit the graduating class this year from the Naval Academy to receive commissions in the Navy?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That has been the practice in all times past?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It would be manifestly unfair with conditions prevailing now, would it not, to discriminate against the class this year by denying the right that has been granted to all preceding classes?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me make this observation. I am not in favor of a large Navy or a large appropriation, but would it not be fairer to reduce the number of those who attend the Naval Academy, rather than to deny those who had attended the right that the others have had in the past?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman has stated it correctly. Congress anticipated last year that we would be confronted with this same proposition and reduced the appointment from four to three, and if this condition continues we will be compelled to reduce it from three to two.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What circumstance is in the way of retiring a number of the older officers and advancing others to permit this graduating class——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We thought last year we would bring in a bill that would accomplish that purpose, and we passed what is known as the Britten bill, hoping that by that there would be an attrition of three or four hundred officers, but the economic conditions are such that these officers who had the privilege to retire have refused to retire, and we have either got to force them out of the Navy with one year's pay very soon, or else we will be compelled in a short time to come here and ask that the Appropriations Committee only provide for two midshipmen. If the economic condition of the country had been such, about 400 or 500 officers who came into the service during the war, would automatically have gone out of the Navy, and it would not have been necessary to have this bill, because last year we passed the so-called Britten bill, to eliminate this congestion that now exists in the Navy that forced this kind of legislation.

Now, permit me to say to this committee it costs approximately $13,000 for the 4-year term to educate one of these boys at the Naval Academy. To educate this class it has cost in the neighborhood of $3,000,000.

There is a military need for them. We need them upon ships that we are building. To-day we are building 16 ships that will come into service in the next three or four years. It requires four years to educate an officer before he can go to the fleet. What will we do with those ships? Are we going to bring them into the fleet without officers? Of course not. The only place we can obtain officers is from the Naval Academy, so that it is absolutely necessary for this House to pass this kind of bill, and in all probability it will be necessary for the next Congress to do it; but from then on either the Committee on Appropriations will be required to reduce the midshipmen to two or else the Naval Affairs Committee will be compelled to bring in additional legislation to force attrition in the Navy that we thought would be accomplished by the Britten bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that the President's Budget has recommended against this bill; that it is against the financial program of the President? Is that not the fact?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am glad the gentleman from Texas called attention to that. If it were not for the gentleman from Texas, I would overlook many of these points that I want to call attention to and make some comments upon. Of course, the Budget is against it.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did the gentleman not put that in his report?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is in the report.

Mr. BLANTON. Where?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This report was submitted to this House on the 1st day of February. On the 21st day of January we submitted the bill to the Navy Department for its comment. In the meantime the committee held its hearings, without having received any report from the Bureau of the Budget. The committee acted favorably, acted unanimously on it, and we reported it on the 1st day of February. On the 3d day of February the Bureau of the Budget sent its report in, and it is printed here and is available with the entire record in the matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Where? There is no report here from the Budget.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As I said to the gentleman, of course the Bureau of the Budget is against it. The Secretary of the Navy says he is against it. Why? Because it involves an expenditure of $448,956. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is against it because it involves an expenditure; but let me say to this House the Constitution places upon the Congress the right to maintain a navy, and it is only with deference that we submit these matters to the Bureau of the Budget to ascertain its views. [Applause.] We are not compelled to submit to the views of the Director of the Budget. [Applause.] I am sorry the Director of the Budget did not promptly answer it so that the answer could accompany the report, but as long as I am chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee I shall submit questions to Congress, irrespective of the attitude of the Budget. [Applause.]

Congress gives us the right to maintain this Navy, and I am going to see that it is submitted to Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of balancing the Budget?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes. I am in favor of balancing the Budget, but I am not in favor of balancing the Budget by scrapping the Army and the Navy and destroying the national defense [applause] and relying upon the mercy of other nations for our preservation. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of increasing the landlubber officers in the Navy—the ones who never see the sea?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course not.

Mr. BLANTON. To such an extent that we will have to put a sales tax on everything that the poor people of the country eat and wear to make up the additional expense?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let me tell the gentleman something about all this talk——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman be good enough to ask the gentleman from Texas if he is in favor of increasing the landlubber prohibition agents that have been on the pay roll for the last 10 years? [Laughter.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, let us forget about that.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Texas is in favor of upholding the Constitution of the United States, as he is under oath to preserve, uphold, and defend it. My vote to supply needed money to enforce the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was merely carrying out my oath as a Representative of the people in Congress.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let me call your attention to this: You oftentimes hear the cry over this country as to the great appropriations we are making for armament. Does the gentleman from Texas know that only 9 per cent of the total appropriations made by Congress last year went to care for the Navy, and that only 11 per cent went to care for the Army? So do not get alarmed that Congress is running wild and making large appropriations for the Army and the Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust this committee will do the square and fair thing by these boys who are going to be graduated in June. Let me tell you where they come from, and I hope all of you will listen to this. How did they get there? You Members appointed them. Let us see where they come from, and you can get this information from the report that is available. Six of them come from Alabama; 6 of them from Arizona; 2 of them from Arkansas; 7 from California; 5 from Colorado; 5 from Connecticut; 1 from Delaware; 1 from Florida; 10 from Georgia; 3 from Idaho; 17 from Illinois; 8 from Indiana; 9 from Iowa; 5 from Kansas; 4 from Kentucky; 3 from Louisiana; 6 from Maine; 10 from Maryland; 11 from Massachusetts; 11 from Michigan; 7 from Minnesota; 5 from Mississippi; 6 from Missouri; 1 from Montana; 10 from Nebraska; 1 from Nevada; 4 from New Hampshire; 8 from New Jersey; 1 from New Mexico; 34 from New York; 7 from North Carolina; 5 from North Dakota; 15 from Ohio; 5 from Oklahoma; 6 from Oregon; 27 from Pennsylvania; 2 from Rhode Island; 8 from South Carolina; 2 from South Dakota; 9 from Tennessee; 9 from Texas; and 1 of them from the seventeenth district of Texas. Is that the gentleman's district?

Mr. BLANTON. That is one I appointed, but instead of thinking about him, to whom the Government has given a $13,760 education for four years, I am thinking of the other 399,000 taxpayers in my district. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Two from Utah, 2 from Vermont, 12 from Virginia, 6 from Washington, 10 from West Virginia, 8 from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know how many from my district? I do not think the gentleman will find any; but if any or all are, I am opposed to it, as I am not in favor of imposing this expense on the people of the country.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What is the gentleman's district?

Mr. STAFFORD. The fighting fifth.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There are none from the fifth district of Wisconsin; 2 from Wyoming and 64 from the country at large and the Territories.

Now, gentlemen, that is the picture. These boys were appointed by the Members of Congress and by Members of the Senate. They will be graduated in June. If you do not to-day pass this bill, then they go out into civilian life. They go out after it has cost the Government $3,000,000 to educate them. They go out with $720 in their pockets. They go out to join the ranks of the great unemployed. They were educated for the purposes of the Navy. They were educated to defend the country upon the ships we are now building. It is necessary from a military standpoint that these men be carried as extra numbers in the Navy, and I trust that this House will act favorably on this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that after we pay $13,760 for four years' training of each of these 261 men many of them in June will resign and will not take their commissions?

Mr. VINSON. If that is so, the country is that much better off, because we do not have to commission them.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am for adequate national defense. I am for adequately providing the Navy of our country with officers [applause], but I am not for wasting the people's money. [Applause.] Is it not about time that we took stock of the facts in this case? Is it not about time that we thought about what we are doing?

We have a fleet. We have 306 ships operating. For those 306 ships, which are quite a way short of what is called the treaty navy, we have 5,600 officers. Great Britain has a fleet. She has a fleet built up fully to the treaty requirements, with much more cruiser tonnage than ours, but Great Britain, instead of having 5,600 officers, has 3,900 officers.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. In the British fleet, however, they do not include, as I understand, their air officers in the total number.

Mr. TABER. No; and that gives them approximately 500. They have about 500 Royal Air Service men, who are assigned to naval service. With us, approximately, we have 784 officers in the Naval Air Service. That, perhaps, might increase the number we should have to 4,684, to put us on a comparable basis, but not anything like what we have.

I have two of these boys from my own district. They have not been treated badly if they go out into civil life. [Applause.] They have been given the very best education that money could buy.

Now, the question is, gentlemen, whether we need these additional officers in the Navy. A year ago this same proposition was up and it was represented to us that because these 500 to 600 emergency officers who went into the Navy during the war could not pass the promotion examinations they would in all probability retire. However, those men have passed the promotion examinations almost entirely, and only about 30 have retired. They will continue in the Navy, rendering service. They did not fail to go out because of business conditions but because they were able to qualify and wanted to hang on to their jobs. Those men will serve for a great many years. With three appointments we will have plenty graduating to take care of all the requirements of the Navy as to officer personnel for years to come.

With reference to the officer personnel, at the present time there is a campaign going on to practically establish an additional graduate school in which we shall put 200 more officers, so that we will be able to keep occupied the officer personnel that we now have.

Now, is it not the wise thing to keep our officer personnel where it needs to be, in order to meet the situation of the Navy, and have it forceful and efficient and have it alert and on its toes, rather than to give them so many that they are falling all over themselves and are not good for anything to us or to the Navy?

It seems to me we should not pass this bill, but that we should represent the taxpayers of the country, whose interests we must serve, or when we get home we will hear from them. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the argument that has just been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is the stock argument which he used last year against this same kind of a bill.

Mr. TABER. I was not on the floor at all then.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; the gentleman was, and so was the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Then the gentleman uses the stock argument appealing to the taxpayer. It is remarkable how the taxpayer is defended and cared for in one piece of legislation and then thrown down in the mud by some other piece of legislation. The same old arguments for home consumption. The comparison of the number of officers in the American Navy with the number of officers in the British Navy is some more of the same old stock stuff. Such a comparison is practically impossible because of the difference in character of the two services. The British have a separate air force, while we have thousands in our Air Service.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] says that the boy he appointed to the academy got a good education. Of course he got a good education, but for whom did we educate him, for himself or for his country—I would like to ask the gentleman?

We are educating these boys for the country's benefit, for the national defense. To suggest that because we do educate them and after they have put in four years of solid, intensive study we are going to turn them out into private life without a commission is unthinkable.

This bill, my friends, is not a serious piece of legislation as far as the Treasury is concerned. It is not so important. It provides that these boys, some 261 of them, whom we have educated for four years at Government expense, may become ensigns in the Navy, and only ensigns. They can not go any higher, because this legislation insures that the number in the ranks above the rank of ensign shall not be increased. They are only carried as temporaries in the ensign grade; and why? So that Uncle Sam can look them over during the next two or three or four years and then out of these 261 boys and any additional boys that are ensigns select the best of them to become lieutenants, commanders, and captains, and rear admirals, if they are fortunate enough to finally be selected up to those higher grades.

Why is not this a good business proposition? Would not the great mail-order houses do this same thing? Would not the great oil companies do this same thing? Would not the great steel companies do this same thing? Would they spend $13,000 on a boy's education and then fire him? That would be absurd.

We should give these boys a chance to show their mettle and if they have the mettle in them that will make them rear admirals some day, for God's sake let the country have the benefit of the education that the taxpayers have paid for.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Does not the gentleman really think that the taxpayers of America would rather pay taxes than tribute to some foreign empire?

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about that and the taxpayers of the country have not the slightest objection to this bill. If this could possibly be left to a vote of the taxpayers of the country, what do you suppose they would say about it? What do you suppose the taxpayers would decide if asked to show their preference between a bill for the national defense and a prohibition bill carrying a lot of snoopers, mattress friskers, and snipers on the pay roll?

The argument is silly, gentlemen. If you were going to provide in this legislation that these 261 boys should ultimately all become captains and commanders at high pay, it would be an entirely different matter; but to suggest they may only be held as temporaries in the ensign grade, the very lowest grade in the Navy, so that Uncle Sam himself may get a look at them and see whether they have the proper timber to make rear admirals, is quite a different thing, and if any of these boys has the proper timber to become a rear admiral, of course, we are all for giving him that chance.

They talk about pay. What difference does it amount to? Every one of these boys is a national asset. He is worth to the Nation five times what it has cost to educate him. Suppose we get dragged into that unholy affair in China, would you not be glad to have these 261 extra boys on your pay roll? Why, of course, you would. Every one of them has been intensively educated in aviation, in radio, in gunfire, in engineering, in navigation, and in every branch of the naval service. Why, my friends, in the event of an emergency arising next month or next year, every one of these boys is worth a thousand times what it has cost the country to educate him, and the country expects you and me to keep him on the pay roll, at least until such time as we can see whether he has the proper capacity and the proper ability and the proper character to handle men and ships and big questions.

This bill has so much merit that it should pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. If these boys resign, do they go into the reserve?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; they go right back into private life.

Mr. HOPKINS. And not into the reserve, subject to call?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not unless they themselves go into the reserve. The choice is voluntary.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York asked the gentleman from Illinois if he did not think the taxpayers had rather put 261 members on the pay roll than in the future pay tribute to some foreign power. I want to say to my friend that the time will never come when America will pay tribute to any foreign power. [Applause.] I believe in an Army and Navy, but you can abolish your Navy, you can abolish your Army to-morrow, and if any foreign power was to undertake to assume jurisdiction over this country there is enough manhood and courage in the men and women of America to maintain their independence. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I can not yield. I have said that I believe in an adequate Navy and Army. You can take my record for over 20 years, and you will find that I have always voted for a reasonable Navy and a reasonable Army. I believe in it to-day, but I am not willing to tax the people of this country $500,000 for the first year, increasing in amount as the years go by, for officers who are not needed. [Applause.]

I would like to see these fine boys get commissions—yes, very much; but if you do not need them, why commission them?

Under the provisions of this bill the 261 midshipmen who are to be commissioned will be in excess of the authorized number of 5,499 commissioned line officers of the Navy. That is what you are asked to do, and yet we are meeting in Geneva to-day talking about the reduction of armament.

In 1935 we are going to hold another great conference in the interest of reducing armament. Why do you want to increase the authorization of officers by 261, unless it be that the boys come from your own districts?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I have not the time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will give the gentleman more time.

Mr. BYRNS. Very well, for a question.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The reason why this is necessary is because we are building now—the committee is providing for building 16 new ships.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; but these are not all the boys to be educated at the academy. We are going to educate more boys, who will be graduated at the academy next June, and the June after that, and the June after that. We are going to have plenty of officers for the ships.

Now, I assume that all these 261 boys will be single men, unmarried midshipmen, and with less than three years of service they receive $1,500 base pay, $219 for subsistence, or a total of $1,719 per annum. Those who are married will be entitled to $400 additional, or a total of $2,199 per annum. On the supposition that all of them will be unmarried men, in this legislation you impose an additional charge on the Federal Treasury of $448,659 for pay alone.

Now, do not forget that that is for the next year and for the year thereafter, and as long as they stay in the service this sum will increase.

And when they get to be 62 years old they will be retired on three-quarters pay. I want this House to know what it is doing when it undertakes to pass a bill of this sort at this time, when you and I are supposed to be doing all we can to conserve the public money. These boys have received an education which cost the Government $13,780 each.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Not unless the gentleman has some time to give me. I am sorry, I will say to my good friend. How many boys in your districts, gentlemen, would like to have this education without the commission? You have thousands of boys in your districts, every one of whom will have to go into business and into the banks and upon the farms and earn the money with which to pay the salaries of these boys you are about to put into positions for life. I am speaking here in the interest of the taxpayers, in the interest of those people who have to earn money to pay the expenses of Government, including these salaries. Of course, there will be other expenses. These men will have to be transported to their stations. It will be necessary to provide them with certain equipment. Some of them most likely will be given some form of postgraduate instruction, and that will cause additional administrative expense, perhaps small individually, but in the aggregate I think it is safe to say that they will cost all told an additional half million dollars during the ensuing fiscal year. When you pass this bill it becomes operative in June, and you will have to take care of their salaries in the deficiency appropriation bill for the month of June and add that to your deficit this year. Then, of course, you have to take care next year of their entire salaries.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will yield me some more time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, the gentleman is going to get all of the time he wants. Everyone wants to hear the views of the Appropriations Committee of this House on this and other bills. The gentleman is in error when he says this would have to go into the deficiency appropriation bill this year.

Mr. BYRNS. Whether it does or not, the money will have to come out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is, as the gentleman said, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I would like to have him in my time tell the House how and when and why he reduced the appropriations for prohibition this year. If he did not, why did he not?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, there are some gentlemen in this House who can not see anything in front of them except the question of prohibition. You will have your day on March 14.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will get the gentleman some time in which to answer the question.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is not going to lead me off of this discussion by talking about prohibition. Naval officers tell us we need more officers. That remains to be seen. As I said, there is a disarmament conference meeting now at Geneva. We do not know what will be the outcome. There will be a naval disarmament conference in 1935.

I think it is safe to say out of these conferences there will be no naval expansion, and I think we have a right to look for a reduction in armament. In that event we will not need more officers, but we will be confronted with the task of getting rid of some of those we have now, and if we pass this bill we will be making our task just that much more difficult. After these lads have served a year or two we will not be able simply to separate them from the pay roll, but we will have to retire them and carry them as a charge on the American people the rest of their lives. Do you know how much we are paying by way of retirement pay to naval officers to-day? We are paying the sum of $5,500,000 every year to retired naval officers, and it is increasing two or three hundred thousand dollars every year. Yet you propose here to commission 261 men additional who, the gentleman from Georgia admits, are not needed now. Of course, he says they are going to build some more ships and then they will be needed. When that time comes they can be taken care of if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Georgia to give me a little more time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. They told us last year, and that was the view of naval officers, that there were 500 officers who had not passed through the Naval Academy who were going to be retired within three years, and that was one of the excuses offered for maintaining this large class at the Naval Academy. What has happened? It has recently been testified in the Committee on Appropriations that, to their surprise, all but 21 of those 500 men stood the examination, and, of course, are going to retain their commissions. In addition to that, they testified before the subcommittee on naval appropriations only the other day that next year they are going to have 250 more naval officers than they have this year for postgraduate courses, and they are applying for a postgraduate school in California to take care of them. That is where you are drifting and that is what you are about to do if you pass this bill. You are about to impose a burden for all the years to come, starting with $500,000 and increasing as the years go by, and I beg of you to pause and consider, in view of the fact that next week you are going to be called upon to vote a sales tax on everything your constituents and mine buy. I beg of you not to increase these appropriations. In the Appropriations Committee we are making every effort we can to cut appropriations.

I hope that this Congress will not impose upon the Appropriations Committee the absolute necessity of making an appropriation for $500,000 next year, which is not needed if the facts as I have them are true. My only reason for appearing here is in the interest of the Treasury and the taxpayers. Nine of these men come from my State, but where there are nine men who will get commissions, there are thousands of boys down there who have not more than an eighth-grade education, who would be delighted to have an education costing $13,780, without a commission. Those men get a splendid education, a fine technical education.

They go out into the world, as the gentleman from Georgia says, finely equipped, equipped to take care of themselves; and they are in better shape to compete with the boys with whom they come in contact in business and private life than they would have been if the Government had not been good to them and they had not won your favor and mine in getting these appointments to the Naval Academy.

I hope you will not pass this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not possible that this Congress, before it adjourns, will be required to pass a second tax bill in an effort to raise money to pay the deficit and expenses of this Government?

Mr. BYRNS. I say to my good friend from Washington that if we pass bills like this and continue to increase authorizations making appropriations necessary, the gentleman is quite right—two tax bills will not take care of it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who has always in the past voted for adequate national defense, and I expect to continue to do so. I have listened to the debate to-day by the proponents of this legislation but have not heard from any one of them the direct need for such legislation. Although it may cause hardship to these individual midshipmen, and will be disappointing to them, if there is no essential need, if it is not an absolute necessity at the present time, then we are not called upon as Members of Congress to vote $500,000 of the taxpayers' money to provide positions for these midshipmen in the Navy. If there is any immediate need in the Navy for these few hundred midshipmen, I will be glad to vote for the bill, but apparently such is not the case.

I simply rise to make an observation. There is a disarmament conference going on at Geneva at the present time. The American Government has made certain suggestions. Among others we have suggested that submarines be eliminated. If that goes through, of course, it would mean we would not require as many officers as we have now in the Navy. We have also suggested—and, I think, in a very hypocritical way—that nations should not use poisonous gas, whereas there has been a treaty pending in the Senate for the last six years which we have not acted upon. But I want to suggest to those who are interested in economy in Government expenses one way to bring about economy and at the same time maintain exactly the same kind of adequate national defense that we have at the present moment.

In 1921 the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, proposed to reduce the number of battleships and battle cruisers over 10,000 tons to 18 on a 5–5–3 ratio with Great Britain and Japan. I am willing to go along and vote appropriations to maintain that ratio, but I do not understand why we can not reduce or halve the number of battleships we have at the present time and yet maintain identically the same kind of national defense if other countries do likewise. Instead of having 18 battleships, if we had 10 and England had 10 and Japan had 6, we would have the same proportional naval defense, and we would thereby be saving over $200,000,000 a year. If the Members who are talking economy mean economy and want to practice it, that is one way to save $200,000,000 and have the same kind of national defense.

Last year we spent $382,000,000 for the maintenance of the Navy, and in 1913 we spent $133,000,000. That is an increase of over 300 per cent.

I only rise to make the observation to those of you who are interested not only in national defense, but in economy at the same time, how it can be brought about. If you actually want to save the taxpayers a larger sum of money annually than you can do in any other way, have our delegates at the conference now sitting at Geneva request a further limitation of naval armament; let our delegation over there propose, just as Mr. Hughes did, to reduce the number of battleships from 18 to 10 on the 5–5–3 ratio, and we will have identically the same proportional national defense, as far as the Navy is concerned. I defy anyone to answer that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman can go even further than he has suggested to the House in the interest of economy by accepting the French suggestion at Geneva, which was that our Navy and all of the other navies of the world be turned over to the League of Nations. Would the gentleman favor that?

Mr. FISH. No; and the gentleman's question in no way answers my suggestion.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BARTON. Does the gentleman realize the present proportion of the English and Japanese and United States Navies?

Mr. FISH. Well, I realize that Great Britain has far less officers in her navy than we have. I realize that our Navy to-day, even in spite of the fact that it is not built up to the 5–5–3 ratio, is better and stronger than the Japanese Navy.

Mr. BARTON. The present ratio is 17.1 for Great Britain, 13 for Japan, and 10 for the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. I do not believe that our Navy Department admits for a moment that our Navy is not stronger than the Japanese Navy at the present time.

Mr. BARTON. That was the evidence taken before the Naval Committee to-day.

Mr. FISH. Then the Naval Committee should get busy and see that we live up to the 5–5–3 ratio, and I will be glad to help.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the law provides that the ratio of strength between the officers and men in the Navy shall be 4 per cent officers and 96 per cent men. The law further fixes the maximum strength of the Navy at 137,000, in even numbers. According to that ratio there could be, according to law, only 5,499 officers.

That is according to the presumption that we have 137,000 men; but, as a matter of fact, we have only 79,000 men. Yet we have the full number of officers that would be authorized by law if we had 137,000 when in fact we have only 79,000 men. We have, however, already gone above the authorization of law as to officers even if we had 137,000 enlisted men, for, as a matter of fact, we had 5,578 officers in the Navy on January 1, this year, and this bill will make 261 more. Thus, our Navy is already top-heavy with officers.

Our friend from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], in his report—it is just a little 1-page report—did not tell us that the President's Budget is against this bill and had recommended against its passage. He should have gone at least far enough in his speech—and he did not do it until I called his attention to it—to tell you that there is an adverse report against this bill by the Secretary of the Navy, who is not an admiral, like our friend from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and our friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]—they both have become admirals in their thoughts and programs since they have been associating with admirals. When I first began to serve here with FRED BRITTEN and CARL VINSON they were the strongest men on this floor for the people against the landlubbering officers in the Navy. I never heard such strong speeches in my life as the gentleman from Georgia then delivered on this floor against naval officers who spent their time lolling around hotels in Washington and the other big cities of the United States. He then contended that they ought to be on ships and not living in the cities of the country. But I have found that after they have associated with these admirals a little while they soon became admirals themselves. There ought to be an admiral's flag on that desk by our friend, FRED BRITTEN, and an admiral's flag on this desk by CARL VINSON. [Applause.]

I want to say this to my friend from Illinois, who is for such a big Navy: Everyone of the men we have appointed to the academy and who will graduate in June—and I have one from my district, one of my appointees—everyone of them was charged with a knowledge of the law, that when they entered there we had too many officers already, and that under the law they could not be commissioned unless we passed another law authorizing it. Everyone of them knew that. Everyone of them was charged with a knowledge of the law, that they could not receive their commissions unless we passed a new law. Everyone of them for four years has received the finest technical training that money will produce. Everyone of them has received an allowance of $780 a year for the past four years. In addition to their schooling, in addition to their food and lodging, they have received $780 a year in cash from the Government, and I had one appointee once who, when he came out of there, had saved about $300 a year out of his allowance.

I appointed a splendid young fellow to that academy named Armand Morgan, who had the honor of being the first honor man of his class. He is being promoted and will go to the top some day. I have had others who resigned. As soon as some are ready to graduate and receive their commissions they resign. They take this four years' training, this $13,760 worth of training, and then resign.

We have done much for any young man when we give him four years of such training at Government expense, and he has no cause to complain. The very minute we commission all of these men in June—these 261 men—the very minute you issue commissions to them, I want to say to my friend from Illinois, that the only way the Government can get rid of them after that is to retire them on pay. Now, however, we can send them back to civil life by paying them about $700. That is what we ought to do, because we are now paying $5,500,000 a year to retired naval officers, who received splendid educations at the expense of the Government.

Did you know that some retired naval officers are drawing $50,000 a year from corporations? We have an admiral who is drawing an admiral's retired pay from the Government, who is now in the very prime of life, mentally and physically, who is also drawing $50,000 a year from a corporation. And the Government paid for their training that qualifies them to command such commercial salaries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who pays for it?

Mr. BLANTON. The people pay for it. I have no fear that we are going to have a war, despite all of this jingo talk by our friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] and our friend from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]. We have given the President of the United States and his jingo Cabinet to understand that they must not precipitate us into war, for we are not going to stand for it. The jingo admirals and the jingo generals in our Navy and Army thoroughly understand that the American people, and their Representatives in this Congress, are not going to countenance any action on their part that might percipitate us into war, and that we are going to require them to keep out of the Far East fight that is not our scrap. And we are watching the jingoes in big business that would like to involve us in war. They are the ones who do not do any fighting, but who make their fortunes out of war. We are watching them.

Why, this country is not going to let these jingoes involve us in any war with Japan. Japan is finding out now that she is losing the respect of every decent, civilized nation on the earth, and the people of that nation will soon rise up in their might and demand that her jingoes come back home.

To speak of involving us in war is foolish and absurd, and I am going to vote against this bill. And after it is passed the President ought to veto it. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], in explaining this bill, called your attention to the fact that out of each dollar of taxes that is raised by the United States Government to-day but 9 cents goes to the support of the Navy and 11 cents to the support of the Army. The gentleman omitted to tell you, however, that out of every dollar of money that is raised by taxation to defray the expenses of this Government, 80 cents goes for preparation for war or for payment of wars we have been in. It is an astounding fact that out of every dollar that is raised by taxation, from all sources, 80 cents goes for payment for past wars or for preparation for new wars.

The gentleman also omitted to tell you that the expense of the Army to-day is three times what it was before we got into the World War. The gentleman also omitted to tell you that the cost of the Navy is practically three times what it was before we got into the war; and we are further away to-day from a war than we have been in 75 years, in my opinion, and if by reason of some mischance we should get into war, we are better prepared to-day than we ever were in the existence of this Union.

We have a standing army and a reserve army of more than 600,000, and we have a potential army, in addition to that, of more than 1,000,000 men who are prepared for war by reason of their experience in the last war. So, all this talk about the necessities of our Army and our Navy comes without any substantial justification.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to suggest in the gentleman's time that we are further away from paying our tax bills than we have been since the Civil War.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and I want to say to you that when the people of this country realize that 80 cents out of every dollar they are having to pay in the way of taxes is going for the payment of wars we have been in or for preparing for additional wars, you are going to hear considerable complaint. Such complaint is coming now from all over this country, and, as has been stated here, we are going to have to resort to a sales tax for the purpose of balancing our Budget. And let me make this prediction: On the 15th of this month all those who pay income taxes to the United States Government, and there are but a very few million of them, when the count is had in the Treasury office, we will find that the bill that is to be reported by the committee this week will not come anywhere near raising the amount of money that will be necessary in order to balance the Budget; and, as has been suggested here, I dare say that not only this tax bill but a second bill, and perhaps a third tax bill, will have to be enacted before the Budget is balanced.

So it is worth while to have some little regard for the taxpayer. I have sympathy for these boys. I have one of them myself who will graduate in this class. He is not going to become a drone. If he has been worthy of the position that has been given him, after receiving the education he has had at the expense of the Government, he will be prepared for any exigency that may come within the period of his active life, and in addition he is well equipped for the battle in civil life. He can go into the reserve if he wants to or he can go out into civil life, as many of them desire to do, and as many of them do, and if you are not content with this plan, there is another way to meet it. You can catapult these old fellows in the Navy out and put in these boys and let them have their chance, and to my mind this would be the sensible thing to do.

Oh, gentlemen, I want to say to you that there is no excuse whatever for us to-day authorizing an appropriation of $500,000 for one year, which is going to be augmented with each passing year until these boys who are to graduate on next graduation day finally go on the retired list themselves.

Mr. Chairman, when the Appropriations Committee, after having strained every possible means and after having gone to the bottom of every proposed appropriation, has cut wherever it could until it hurts—hurts your section of the country and hurts mine, and then to have legislative committees bring into this House bills authorizing appropriations not in the amount of the few thousands of dollars we have saved, but going into the millions, it is a pretty discouraging thing to the men who have been appointed for the purpose of making these savings. I thank you. [Applause].

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in assuming a position of responsibility, I always endeavor to put myself in the other fellow's shoes. I know that each one of these young men, when given an appointment which enabled him to qualify himself as a midshipman at Annapolis, believed that if he complied with all the rules and regulations and graduated, that afterwards he would be extended the opportunity of being commissioned, if he saw fit to remain in the service.

I have carefully considered the provisions of this legislation and I have made up my mind to vote for it.

However, I have suggested to the chairman of the committee that we ought to amend this bill so that we will not find ourselves in a similar predicament at the beginning of the next session of the Congress.

I know, and you know, if we increase any one rank or any one class of officers in the Navy to the extent of 261, this will provide a hump that will result in a carbuncle and there must be some additional legislation in the future to bring about the necessary equalization.

During the time I have served as a member of the committee we have had equalization bills one after another. Every time we equalize one class another class comes in and accuses us of dealing unjustly with them and asks for relief.

I say that this bill ought to be amended so that those who are to come afterwards, the young men appointed by Members, will know that the increased percentage in this bill is only good for four years. I would suggest an amendment of about three words so that the young men who come into the service as ensigns will know that something has got to be done in the way of legislation, or they will have to go out after a service of four years.

In addition, it will give notice to the young men appointed this year and the next year that we are not going to increase the percentage any further.

I have visited the Naval Academy and I have taken great pride in the institution.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has made an excellent speech against this measure. I respectfully call his attention to the fact that there are certain situations existing at the Naval Academy that ought to be looked into. If I am correctly informed, we are now maintaining that institution at practically the same cost as when we appointed five midshipmen instead of three. I have been making a comparison of appropriation bills and find that there was set aside some $290,000 to pay for the service of professors at Annapolis. That is in comparison with $46,000 paid for professors at West Point. There is something wrong when a situation like that exists. There is too much difference when you take into consideration the fact that the Navy has only five or six hundred more students than are in the military school.

I find there was carried in the appropriation bill last year $276,139 to take care of the civilian employees at West Point and for Annapolis it carried $629,000, or nearly three times as much.

So I say that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the members of that splendid committee should look into these figures and find out why there is a discrepancy, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, in taking care of the same kind of duties.

I am going to vote for this bill, but I will offer some amendments, when the proper time comes, to limit the purpose of this extra percentage to a period of four years and to cut down the extra cost.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment is a good one, and I hope it will be adopted by the House.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I think we are all agreed that what we would like to have is the greatest possible degree of efficiency in every officer that we have in the Navy. It is also agreed that when the authorization bill for the Navy was written that the ratio of officers to enlisted men should stand as 1 to 25. That was no doubt carefully thought out as the number that should prevail in order to bring about the largest possible degree of efficiency in each and every naval officer in the Navy.

In lessening the number of enlistments and increasing the number of officers, we find ourselves in the situation of decreasing the amount of expert work that an officer has to do. For instance, if we have an expert who is engaged in technical work, and we bring about a system that would keep that man out of work two years out of every three, the net result would be to destroy his efficiency as well as lower the efficiency quota of all men engaged in that particular work. So every time we bring about an increase in the number of naval officers, we decrease the efficiency of every man in that establishment. I know branches of the other service where it has been said that a man is lucky if he spends one year in seven with troops. When you permit a situation like that, you are not contributing to national military defense, but you are bringing about situations that destroy that defense. When we increase the number of naval officers we at the same time lessen the amount of work that they have to do, lessen the number of years at sea, and thus destroy their efficiency. Instead of assuring the country a maximum degree of military preparedness, we are actually doing the things that destroy preparedness against military attacks. Let us not get it into our heads that the more people we add to our establishments the larger is our military efficiency, because that is not so, and in this particular instance, every man that you add to the officer personnel of the Navy, the less efficient becomes the entire body of officers. Instead of doing those things calculated to make our Navy prepared for an emergency, you are destroying the efficiency of the establishment itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, day after to-morrow I shall begin my twentieth year of service in the House of Representatives. [Applause.] During all that time under the reigns of both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party I have seen how difficult it has been to trim, cut, or reduce expenditures. Retrenchment is the hardest work of any Congress. It simply is not done. Expenditures of the Federal Government increase and continue to increase. Balance the Budget, cry the leaders, and the Budget will not balance. Some years ago when the then young Representative from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would take the floor and cry out against the expenditure of the people's money I thought he was just filling the air. I thought that prosperity might continue. I want to say now that BLANTON, of Texas, has arrived; his prophecies were correct, his judgment was good, and, Mr. Chairman, we have now reached a condition in the Federal Treasury where I doubt if Congress with any tax bill the great Committee on Ways and Means may bring out can raise the taxes necessary to anywhere nearly balance the Budget. Yet many of the people in the various districts in every mail are calling for more appropriations that will cause still more taxes and still more deficit. Apparently we have taught the people to call on the Federal Government. Some people seem to think that there are two sets of taxpayers. They seem to think that we can raise taxes by Federal taxation, and that in the States we can raise it by State taxation; but every one of us knows there is but one set of taxpayers, and that one set of taxpayers is just about broke now. In the great State of Washington, a rich, prosperous, fine State, proud and wealthy, we will not have 3 men out of 10 who will pay income taxes as against those who paid a year ago.

Mr. KELLER. Why?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Because their incomes have faded out.

Mr. KELLER. Again, why?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not go into economic conditions in three minutes' time.

Mr. KELLER. That is what I would like to have the gentleman do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Write out the questions and I shall answer them after a while. States can not raise their necessary taxes. People who were prosperous are unable to pay the mortgages or the interest or the taxes on their property, and I for one will help the Democratic majority of this House from this time on to balance the Budget, come what will. [Applause.]

The trouble with this particular kind of a bill is that it reaches to the relief of one young man in nearly every congressional district. We in the House of Representatives get to be special pleaders. We think that this little appropriation bill amounts to nothing. Each one of us knows one boy in the Annapolis class of 1932 that we would like to help out at Federal expense. You get a land-office case, and you go down as a special pleader and try to put that one case over and forget it is only one of a large number of cases. What the majority of the people want you to do is to start in and economize with a great big capital "E." They want you to help balance the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I don't know whether it is a coincidence that I should follow my colleague from my own State, but he and I are of different opinions in matters of this kind. I realize that we are here to save money. I have not been here for 20 years like my colleague, nor did I contribute to the deficit over this period of 20 years or can I be held responsible for it. This matter is just a little bit more than a mere matter of saving money. It is a matter of national defense. I heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] call attention to the fact that we are reducing our efficiency when we increase the officer personnel. That is the same argument that he made some time ago when they asked him to enlarge the Army. He wanted to cut down the personnel of the Army then, and now he wants to cut down the personnel of the officers of the Navy. How can he do that and still be in favor of national defense? I heard the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and I agree with him that we should save money.

The other day when we talked about taking a fort off of the border line on the Rio Grande, the gentleman forgot all about the taxpayers. The gentleman stood up and said it was going to ruin that district down there. The gentleman said there was no thought of war at this time, but at the same time he wants to maintain that little fort in his State because it belongs to them. [Applause.] I say to you that I come from a State that is intensely interested in the Navy Department. If I lived in Indiana, Mr. WOOD'S home State, I would not fear any war on either coast. It will never get there. But I say to you I do not know whether it is a warlike measure or a breath of war, but it has been brought to my attention that the entire fleet has been ordered into the Pacific. This has accomplished something for the western Members that we have been attempting to accomplish for a great many years, and we thank you for sending it over there for a mere visitation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. That is just a little more jingoism.

Mr. HORR. Not jingoism. If I jingoed any more than the gentleman from Texas, I would yield the crown. [Applause.] I shall talk about something now that the gentleman from Texas will understand. The other day the gentleman was here advocating and fighting for what? To keep one appropriation where it was. Where were the poor people then when the gentleman was advocating something that would mean salaries for snoopers and men who enter your homes looking for liquor? Did the gentleman forget the poor people at that time? [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I was thinking of the mothers and children.

Mr. HORR. Those are the people the gentleman should think about but he should be consistent all the way through. Surely, we will put an admiral's flag on that desk, and an admiral's flag on that desk, but we are going to put a cannon right there—Bishop Cannon.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did the gentleman say Bishop Cannon?

Mr. HORR. I said Bishop Cannon.

Mr. BRITTEN. He has been sitting on his lap for 15 years. [Laughter.]

Mr. HORR. I can follow the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as a statesman, but when it comes to matters of service in the Army forces I believe I know as much as even the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations about the Army service. The gentleman speaks of our raising a million men overnight. It was only a short decade ago when that cry went out. What happened? You had to conscript us and take some of us yowling and squawking up to the front lines. Talk to me about a million men overnight! I happen to have been in command of men who, their former officers told me, were sent over the top and who could not fire a rifle. There they were—gun fodder for superior militarism. Talk about immediate needs! Of course, we may not need those men immediately. We will not need any ships immediately. Why do you not junk our navy yard out at Bremerton, Wash.? There is no evidence of war. Why build all these boats? We could get together a million men overnight with our great man power. I suppose we could create a battleship overnight and then go out and give battle to trained men on real armament.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I trust the gentleman will not misrepresent my position in this House. I favor a liberal Navy and I favor a reasonable Army. I do not want the gentleman to put me in a false attitude before this House.

Mr. HORR. May I inquire when did the gentleman become a big-Navy man?

Mr. BYRNS. For 24 years I have been voting for Navy appropriations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Washington five additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. For 24 years I have been voting for liberal appropriations for the Navy and Army, but I am not willing to do so unnecessarily, as the gentleman just said he was. We do not need these officers, and I am not willing to vote $500,000 out of the Treasury and take it from the taxpayers each year to take care of officers who are not needed. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. The gentleman will not misunderstand me about the need. There is a difference between immediate need and preparedness. [Applause.]

May I also call attention to the fact that we do not need cantonments now; we do not need any merchant marine today for defense; but the gentleman would wait until the last moment and then go out and by contract, at 10 per cent plus, and God knows what else, erect cantonments and build ships. There is no excuse at all for it.

Mr. BYRNS. Does not the gentleman know that if these men are not commissioned in June they will be eligible for commissions as officers in the Naval Reserve?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No, no.

Mr. HORR. No. Just a moment. I will answer the gentleman. In the first place, that is not true. In the second place, I served in the Army, and I am ill adapted to-day for military service. Because of the time elapsing from the time I was in active service I would not be worth 15 cents as an officer in any group.

Mr. BYRNS. As to commissions in the reserve, I know whereof I speak. Does the gentleman believe that these boys are needed next year in this service?

Mr. HORR. Did we not stand——

Mr. BYRNS. I asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. HORR. And I will answer it in this way: I can only do it by referring to past history. Did not the gentleman himself hear a distinguished candidate for President, within three months of hostilities, say he was going to keep us out of war, and he was elected to the high office of President on the statement that he was going to keep us out of war?

Mr. BYRNS. No; I did not hear that.

Mr. KELLER. Had kept us out of war.

Mr. HORR. Had kept us out of war.

Mr. BYRNS. He had done it until that time.

Mr. HORR. He did it until after election.

Mr. BYRNS. No; he had done it up until that time.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then what did he do?

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, later on, when we found our ships were being destroyed and citizens of this country being sunk at sea we did what we ought to have done, we went in to protect the flag and our citizens.

Mr. HORR. I want to ask a question: Did you declare war when your first citizens were sunk in the sea?

Mr. BRITTEN. No.

Mr. HORR. Or did you wait until after election before you declared war?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. HORR. I am new. I do not want to get into an argument. Our distinguished friend from New York comes to us with this idea of the Geneva conference. My Lord, I am going to quote a real and authentic Democrat, Will Rogers, who said, "We are the only country in the world that never lost a war or ever won a conference." [Applause.] You go and appropriate money and you say you are thinking about your dear people at home, the poor taxpayers. You are not kidding those people. They have heard that before. I heard it when I was a youngster, and we are still hearing it from the floor of this House, and it is a joke. It is that which makes the Congress a joke to a considerable number of our people. Then you turn right around and vote thousands of dollars to send some people to the Geneva conference to argue with France and other nations who have no regard for us as to whether or not we should put ourselves in a position of preparedness. It is a joke and you know it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What makes Congress a joke is that down on the hustings Congressmen tell the taxpayers they are for them, but whenever a bill comes up here taking their money, Members will find some excuse to vote for it, even when there is a possible Treasury deficit of $2,200,000,000 for the coming two years.

Mr. HORR. I never could understand the people of the gentleman's constituency, and I can not now. They sent the gentleman to Congress. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I think they will rank with the gentleman's constituents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself eight minutes. It may be that some Members of this House do not understand the real question that is involved in this bill. There is no attempt here to decrease the officer strength of the Navy. That is established by law at 4 per cent of the enlisted strength. The question before the committee is whether we shall increase the prescribed officer strength of the Navy by providing berths at the expense of the taxpayers for those whom we have nurtured by giving them a college education for four years.

I would be ashamed of any midshipman whom I might have appointed to the Naval Academy who, after having received four years of technical engineering education, would ask Congress to provide him with a berth in excess of the prescribed number of the officer personnel of the Navy.

This is the first time during this Congress, after three months' session, that there has been any measure presented which involves the essential principle of violating the fundamental principle of balancing the Budget. That is the essential principle. Are you to-day, in midseason, after three months' session, going to say to the American people that the Congress is going to add to the burden of the Government not only to the extent of $500,000 but on the proposal of the gentleman from Oklahoma $1,000,000 next year, $1,500,000 the next year, and $2,000,000 the following year? And for what purpose? To wet nurse these boys whom we have appointed to receive an education for four years. They can go out into the world and become efficient engineers. Tell me not that their four years of training in the Naval Academy will not be of value to them in case of war emergency, and, as all you gentlemen know, we can call upon them in time of any emergency.

Why should we now violate the fundamental postulate of this Congress not to increase expenditures beyond the amount called for by the Budget by providing a nice high salary for young midshipmen who have been favored at the Government's expense and who have received a fine engineering education?

The reason why we are not sending more cadets to receive an education to its maximum capacity is because Congress has not authorized it. If we did send down the maximum strength that the academy could take care of, there would be the agitation which is now before the Congress of giving them a life career, at the expense of whom? At the expense of the taxpayers. We would be asked to give them a life career so that they could go along wearing their epaulets in peace time and having the distinction of being naval officers. I would disown any cadet whom I had appointed if he should ask me to give him continued employment in view of the flattened conditions which now exist.

Let me say that the boys who go there do not always go with the expectation of making a career. They are the favored ones of the country, like those we send to West Point. They are the favored sons of the country, because at these institutions they receive an education which you can not take from them.

Tell me not that a graduate from the Military Academy or a graduate from the Naval Academy would not be qualified on a minute's notice to accept a commission and carry out the work which he was trained to perform at these institutions.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I want to prevent this same situation happening at the next session of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. We tried to accomplish it last year by providing that instead of authorizing four cadets for each district we limit the number to three. Yet we now have this organized propaganda for the purpose of continuing these boys from each of these districts in these nice berths.

What was the motive of the gentleman from Georgia in reading the numbers that would be affected from each State? Only to try to have Members with midshipmen coming from their districts vote for this measure at the expense of the taxpayer. It ill becomes any Democrat who is standing on a program of economy to launch this extravagant program on the people of the country, which will cost them at least $2,000,000 in a couple of years and which will haunt us and haunt us should this bill be passed, and many other bills that may come in hereafter. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the preceding speaker has referred to the very clever ruse of the chairman of the committee in reading to the House the districts and States that are affected by this bill. It was a very appealing move for him, as chairman of the committee, to ask the Navy Department to insert in the hearings, district by district, the Members who would be affected.

Then another well-planned move was, when he mailed the hearings to all the Members of the House—I assume he did—because I received mine with my particular midshipman at the academy checked off in pencil so that I should be sure not to overlook the fact.

Now, gentlemen, we ought to think of this measure in terms of our country and not in terms of some dear, fine boy whom we love, who has been named to the academy. I do have a boy from my home county in this class. I do hold it as one of my ambitions to see this young man an officer in the Navy of the United States, but, gentlemen, that young man would be unworthy to wear the epaulets of an officer unless he told me to do my duty by my country and not at the expense of the Treasury extend a favor to him. And what I say of that boy, I say of his people. They want him to be an officer, but they prefer, above that thought, that this Congress do the right thing by the Naval Establishment of the United States. We have got to think of this question in terms of our Navy, of our national needs, of our country.

Now, what is the situation? Under the authorization of general law there may be 4 per cent as many officers of the line as there are authorized enlisted personnel. This would give the Navy 5,499 officers. To-day, instead of having 5,499 officers, we have 5,578 officers, exclusive of 61 additional numbers. How does this come about? It comes about because last year there was placed by the Senate upon the appropriation bill a provision that would take the entire class that graduated last year into the officer personnel of the Naval Establishment.

When the bill providing appropriations passed this House a year ago we carried money for the appointment of three midshipmen for the present year to the Naval Academy. We fought and beat a proposition to make the number four instead of three. The Senate placed the number of midshipmen at the academy upon the bill at four. That body also provided that the entire class of last year be given commissions. When we went into conference, and as a sort of compromise, the Senate receded upon the amendment providing four midshipmen annually and the House receded upon the question of graduating the last class of midshipmen. And what was the argument used a year ago? The argument, and you will find it in the hearings as well as in the debates, was to the effect that we had something like 600 emergency officers then in the Navy who had not graduated from Annapolis but had advanced from the warrant-officer groups who would not be able to pass the examinations and would go out of the officer personnel of the regular establishment of the Navy instead of receiving promotion. I said this number was too high. I said the estimate was wrong and the fact of the business is the testimony of officers from the Navy Department was wrong and the statement I made to this House was correct. In other words, only about 20 or 30 of these officers have been separated from the naval service as active officers, and this is why you have the large hump, to-day, of officers in the Navy over the officer personnel that you need.

Now, what will be the effect of passing this bill? You will add an entire graduating class to the existing hump of the officer personnel of the Navy. You will add several hundred officers whom you do not need, measured either by the officer personnel of the line of Great Britain with a comparable navy to ours, with about 1,377 less officers of the line than we have in our line; or, again, measured by the use that is to-day made of the officers of the line.

A preceding speaker has told this House that the officers of the Navy to the extent of something like 200 will be put into the graduate schools of the United States next year. He is correct. Why? Because the officers are not needed upon ships. Therefore the best thing naval administration can think of is to put them into a graduate school where they will continue to do graduate work though remaining officers of the Naval Establishment.

There is another factor. Another gentleman has made the appeal that since these midshipmen were appointed to the academy therefore upon graduation they should be commissioned. The very fact, the gentleman urges, that they were appointed should guarantee them a commission. But the gentleman seems to forget that until the World War the graduating classes of the academy contributed only a small percentage of their number to the officer personnel. Go back to the admiral list of the Navy to-day, to the fine admirals who have been before our committee, and they have told us during our present hearings, as they have told us heretofore, that many of their numbers were not commissioned and as low as 33 per cent or 20 per cent of the graduates in their day were commissioned as officers of the Navy. The others who graduated from the academy did not have useless and misspent lives to look forward to. On the other hand, they were the favored young men of our country. Why? Because we have at Annapolis a great institution that gives a basic foundation to young men graduating at ages of from 20 to 22 or 24 years, an age which enables them to go out and become engineers or architects or builders, or with a little postgraduate work successful men in any of scores of lines of endeavor.

Talk about its being a handicap to a young man to go to the Naval Academy—four years of as fine education as can be found in the United States for these young men! I remember well, after I had completed four years in my home college, I was elected to a fellowship in one of the big universities that afforded me $320 a year. Gentlemen, I thought that a piece of heaven had been opened up to me. Yet here you are giving to these young men not $320 but an education that is costing $3,000 a year for each midshipman and that can not be surpassed in any institution in the United States to-day. Yet gentlemen turn around and use this fact as an argument for incurring additional expense and commissioning these men in the Navy of the United States.

Gentlemen, consider the alternate courses that may be followed if these young men—some of them—go back into civil life, if they do not receive commissions; they may become members of the Naval Reserve of the Navy—indeed commissioned officers, I have no doubt—and the Governmen would receive the benefit of their training in the event of an emergency that might confront our country.

If they be commissioned, then you send them into the Navy as ensigns, and the expenditure that will be incurred will be well-nigh one-quarter of a million dollars more than it otherwise would during the next 16 months, and thereafter nearly a half million a year as a minimum, with probable increases from time to time.

But consider the problem from an entirely different point of view. Over and over again appeal has been made to this House to permit certain men to retire as officers in the Army or the Navy, because they were constituting a hump, and thereby preventing the promotion of other officers behind them. The proposed bill has been cleverly drawn to make an immediate appeal, in that it provides service for these officers of the line only in the rank of ensign.

Unless this bar be lifted by some future Congress, then the position of these prospective officers will be more adverse than it could possibly be though denied commissions upon graduation. Fresh from Annapolis, they will be able to enter into some other institution of higher learning, or take up a special course, or enter some professional career, by reason of the training that has been given them. If you permit them to go into the Navy as ensigns, and do not amend the law at some future date, they will constitute a hump in the Navy. Then these officers will be dissatisfied, and will bring down upon your heads maledictions for what you are proposing now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I will consume but three or four minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman please, I would like two minutes more.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] complains of the attitude of the committee in sending out a report and the full hearing in reference to this bill. The difference between the Naval Affairs Committee and the gentleman's subcommittee, of which he used to be the head, is that the Naval Affairs Committee have so much faith in whatever bills they bring to Congress that we like to have the light of day turned upon them and have everyone know all about them. We are willing that the House and every Member should know all the facts relating to every detail of this bill. I trust the gentleman in the future will be as fair to the House in sending out a full stenographic report of all hearings before his subcommittee, so that the House can be as well posted on that matter as it is on this.

Mr. FRENCH. Our hearings are always published in extenso.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We are aware of the fact that they are published, and also of the fact that oftentimes the reporter is asked to raise his pen when testimony is being given, and we have no information about that particular testimony except as we gather it through the grapevine method.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], is very much excited about this bill and excited about this enormous expenditure of $480,000. It would have been far better for the gentleman from Tennessee and the other four horsemen from the Committee on Appropriations if they had grown excited about the enormous expenditure of four and a half billion dollars at the last session of Congress. These distinguished gentlemen during the last session of Congress appropriated money at the rate of $36,000 a minute, and they are now excited about an expenditure of $480,000. The gentleman from Tennessee further said that if these boys go out of the academy they go into the Naval Reserve. Of course they do not go into the Naval Reserve. They go out to join the ranks of the unemployed in this country after the Government has spent millions of dollars to educate them.

No single member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and there are 21 of us, would have the temerity to bring this bill here merely for the sake of giving these boys commissions unless there was a military reason for doing so. The military reason for it is that this very committee, which has hurled every argument it can against the bill, is providing for construction year by year of 16 battleships, and we have to have officers to man these ships. That is the military reason that we are asking that these officers be commissioned.

Mr. BYRNS. When will the ships be completed?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I trust one of them will be completed next year and the year after next and the year after next.

Mr. BYRNS. Is it not a fact that ships are going out of commission as new ones are coming in?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course; but is it not a fact that it takes four years to make a naval officer? I ask this House to do the fair and square thing by these boys. They were appointed to the academy in 1927. They have gone there and they have qualified themselves. There is a military necessity why this Congress should pass this bill to give these boys their commissions.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932: Provided, That the number of such officers so appointed shall, while in excess of the total authorized number of line officers, be considered in excess of the number of officers in the grade of ensign as determined by any computation.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma: After the word "that," in line 6, and before the word "the," in line 7, insert the words "until after 1936."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words in respect to the amendment. When the present midshipmen were appointed they were naturally of the opinion that they would be graduated and commissioned as ensigns. In view of that fact, I think it is the duty of this House to serve the right kind of notice now so that the midshipmen who are to come afterwards will know that in 1936 the percentage that relates to officers will go back to 4 per cent, and having that thought in mind and wanting to be fair to those that come afterwards and those that are now in the academy, I have offered this amendment.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR] relative to me—and I heard only a part of it as I came down the aisle—I rise to say that I believe in a reasonable Navy and have always voted for a reasonable Navy. I expect to continue to do so. Also I believe in a reasonable Army. I believe in a reasonable state of preparedness. No one ever before accused me of holding any other attitude with reference to the Army and the Navy. I do not believe, however, in a moment of hysteria, that we should undertake to add to the burdens of the taxpayers whom we are sworn to represent and to stand for, by adding the great additional expense involved in this particular proposition. They say it is a military necessity. I call upon you, my friends, and upon the record to show where any gentleman has demonstrated that this is a military necessity. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] says that we are going to build some more ships. He has a bill now, which I presume is on the calendar, calling for an authorization of $616,000,000 for the building of ships. Congress has not yet acted upon it. But even if it is authorized, if we proceed with the building, it will be several years before they are put into commission, and we all know that as these ships come into commission, other ships, as the gentleman admitted, go out. What becomes of the officers upon those ships which go out of commission as the new ones come in?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I am sorry; I do not have time. I say if you are in favor of economy, if you are in favor of responding to the appeals that have been made by the President of the United States to hold down these appropriations, you will vote against this bill. It is not asked for. On the contrary, as I recall, and the gentleman from Georgia can correct me if I am wrong, it is not favored by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is not favored by the Budget. For that reason it can not be approved by the Navy Department.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, that is a reflection upon the Secretary of the Navy. I have observed in the past he has been quite free to express his opinions, even though they came in conflict with the President of the United States.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I say to you that the Secretary of the Navy is not on record in favor of this bill. It is not approved by the Bureau of the Budget. Therefore it is not approved by the President of the United States. I hope that this House will maintain the reputation which it has established over the country, on both sides of this aisle, of standing for economy in this hour when your constituents and mine are being taxed to the limit in order to take care of the ordinary expenses of the Government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations speaks to the House as seriously as he just now has, of course, his words will carry weight. I wish to suggest to the younger Members of the House, who have not been here for 20 years, as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and others have, that many gentlemen who have spoken against this legislation to-day were, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], so-called small-navy men. But they said, "I am for an adequate navy or I am for an efficient navy." But they always voted against the best interests of the service. Most of them in 1913, when the question arose as to whether we would appropriate for one battleship or none, voted for none, but insisted that they were for an adequate navy. An adequate navy, my friends, should mean a navy second to none other. A second-class navy is a losing navy.

Another time when the question arose in this House whether we would have one battleship or two battleships this distinguished group of officials of the Government who are for an efficient navy and an adequate navy voted for the one ship rather than two, the no ship rather than one.

My friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] would wreck the Navy to-morrow on the theory that we do not need a navy, and yet he would say he was for adequate national defense. The word "adequate" means nothing to those who think like the professional pacifist Libby. Even he (Libby) will say he is for an adequate national defense. The gentlemen who have talked against this legislation are opposed to a real first-class navy. They are not necessarily opposed to this bill from the taxpayer's standpoint.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. I am sorry, but I do not have time. Practically every small-navy man in this House is also an ardent prohibitionist. They seem to go hand in hand. His votes would wreck the Navy, but not one dollar shall be cut from the prohibition-enforcement appropriations. Prohibition appears more sacred to them than even the national defense. Oh, no; not a dollar shall be saved on the silly enforcement of a costly legislative failure. The Volstead law is a thing too sacred to touch. All other appropriations may be slashed, but not the one affecting the now dejected noble experiment. If the 261 graduates of the Naval Academy affected by this bill were to be enrolled in the Coast Guard for rum running, every dry in the House would extol its merits. They will vote millions for snoopers and snipers but nothing for real fighting men.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; not now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion in order to get the floor. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. Chairman, when an able lawyer like our friend from Washington [Mr. HORR] can not establish his case by facts he attacks his opponent personally. The reason my friend the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORR] can not understand my constituents is that they are a different kind of people from the people the gentleman represents. I do not have any Japanese in my district. The gentleman has 15,000 Japanese in his district. They operate the hotels in part of Seattle, these 15,000 Japanese.

Those 15,000 Japanese can not own property under the law, but they find a way of owning it through corporations in Seattle. I will frankly admit that I do not understand the gentleman's 15,000 Japanese in his district. But I am sure that he must understand them. Their ways are not the ways of my constituents. Their language is not the language of my constituents. Their predilections are not the predilections of my constituents. It is quite natural that representing 15,000 Japanese the gentleman can not understand my constituents.

The nearly 400,000 splendid people in my district are practically 100 per cent white people of America, not naturalized Americans, but most of them are natural-born Americans, most of them born in my district. That is the reason the gentleman can not understand them. I do not understand the Jap language, customs, and morals, but he evidently does. He also has Chinamen there, about 7,000 or 8,000 in his Seattle district. I have not any Chinamen in my district. That is the reason the gentleman can not understand my constituents.

So far as the service of my friend during the war is concerned, I commend him. I have not an unkind word to say about him personally. He can talk about me all he wants to, but he must not talk about my constituents. [Laughter.] They are the best people on God's earth. They are the whitest people on God's earth. They are some of the most intelligent people on God's earth. Many of them have been voting for me for 25 years and now have children who are my strongest supporters.

After the gentleman from Washington serves out his apprenticeship and after he gets over his second election—you know, this next election will be the crucial time for the gentleman—then, maybe, he may criticize constituents. Lots of fellows come here and stay only two years. They can get by one election, but it is hard for them to get by the second and the third. After the gentleman gets by his second election and then possibly the third, if he is so fortunate, then he can understand something about the constituents of other Members, but until then he will be ignorant about them.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HORR. As I am to have but one term, will not the gentleman let me have a good time while I am here? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly. If to have a good time it is necessary for the gentleman to talk about the gentleman from Texas, I will turn him footloose; let him say all he wants to, but he must let my constituents alone. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman will come down to my district this summer, I will take him fishing and show him some of the finest fishing in the world. If he will come down there next November, before we meet in the December session, I will take him out and show him some of the finest hunting in the world, and incidentally I will show him the finest people in the world. They are hospitable, honest, intelligent, law-abiding, law-enforcing, God-fearing men and women—the salt of the earth.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The amendment has already been adopted. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion, because I have one more amendment which ought to be explained.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That does not preclude the gentleman from offering his amendment. I am moving that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I would like to have an opportunity to explain the amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold the motion for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma: At the end of the section add: "And provided further, That any midshipman commissioned by this act shall not be eligible for retirement pay if separated from the service within a period of five years."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. This is an amendment offered to the legislation for the purpose of taking care of the very same situation that has been brought to the attention of the committee by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and those who are opposed to the legislation. Frequently in the past we have added limitations of this kind and I especially refer the Chair to that class of reports that comes from the various committees for the purpose of correcting military records. We have added provisions that the party benefited should not be eligible for certain considerations, and that being true I think an amendment of this kind should be added to the bill so that the midshipmen who are now eligible to receive this consideration may know that at the end of four or five years, if it becomes necessary to reduce the percentage of officers, as it will be under the terms of the amendment I have just offered, they can either resign or they can continue by accepting the commission that will be given to them.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane for the simple reason it deals with the question of retirement pay. The question of retirement pay is not involved in the issuance of a commission. It is an entirely foreign subject matter to that of the bill, which is to grant a commission to a midshipman when he is graduated from the Naval Academy.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MARTIN of Oregon). The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

The Chair considers the amendment germane. The committee has already placed a limit on the service of these men of four years, and the amendment provides that during that limited period they shall not be subject to retirement.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak briefly to the members of the committee. This bill in the form in which it was introduced would provide for increased expenditures, and it is my desire to prevent this as much as possible. As I view it, these midshipmen who are now to be graduated are to be given special consideration by the terms of this bill, in that they are allowed to be commissioned as ensigns for a period of four or five years. This being true, they know beforehand, if they accept the provisions of the legislation, that at the end of five years, should it be necessary to reduce the number of officers in the Navy, they will not be eligible for retirement pay.

Let me call your attention to a situation that has not been brought out on this floor. Instead of having 5,000 officers in the Navy we have over 9,000, and this number includes the staff officers and the warrant officers.

There is no dearth of officers at the present time; and the reason I am supporting this legislation is because these boys, when they were taken into the Naval Academy, were not put on notice they were not going to be commissioned after graduation. I take it that in view of the fact that they were not given this notice, they ought to be extended the opportunity of being commissioned as ensigns of the Navy; but at the end of four years, inasmuch as we have adopted an amendment which will take care of the increased percentage, there ought to be some provision in the legislation so that the taxpayers will not be penalized an additional amount equal to the retirement pay.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman have any doubt but what five years from now the same pressure will be put on that Congress that is being put on this Congress to retain them in the Navy whether they are needed or not?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I will answer the gentleman in my own way. The statement was made that we ought not to turn these young men out when conditions are so bad, when there are millions of people out of employment, and that these men have gone ahead complying with the rules and regulations of the department in a proper way and are entitled to this consideration. I agree with this statement of facts, but there is nothing in this legislation that will require a graduate of this year's class to be commissioned as an ensign, and if he wishes to avail himself of that privilege, then he should know beforehand that at the end of four or five years he might have to be taken out of the service, and if such is the case, he would not be entitled to retirement pay.

Mr. WHITE. Is there any provision in the gentleman's amendment to care for those men who may be disabled in line of duty during the five years?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will be rejected. It is not the fair thing to do, because if these boys are given a commission they should have every right and every provision of law in their favor that applies to any other officer of the United States Navy. [Applause.]

The amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma makes fish of one and fowl of another. The gentleman denies this class the right to have the benefit of retirement pay. Think of it. One of these boys is injured in line of duty; under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma he goes out of the Navy, but is not entitled to retirement pay. Why, the very face of it shows the unfairness of the amendment, and I trust the committee will promptly vote it down.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma?

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 121 ayes and 4 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MARTIN of Oregon, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8033) providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 143, not voting 105, as follows:

On motion of Mr. VINSON of Georgia, a motion to reconsider the bill by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REAR ADMIRAL GEORGE H. ROCK

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, we have just concluded a very interesting discussion concerning midshipmen of the present day. Reference to midshipmen of other days is therefore timely and interesting. I avail myself of the brief time given to pay tribute to Rear Admiral George H. Rock, who on November 21 of the current year will have completed 47½ years of splendid service in the Navy of the United States. [Applause.] Admiral Rock entered the Naval Academy in May of 1885 and was a classmate of that other distinguished graduate, Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson, the two being the leaders of their class. Admiral Rock has had a singularly successful career in the Navy. In the Construction Corps he has proceeded from one position of responsibility to another and from one place of honor to another until within the last six years he has been at the head of this important Department of the Navy. He has represented the Navy Department in the International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea and is regarded as an outstanding authority in the field of naval construction. With exceptional efficiency he combines rare personal qualities which have made him greatly beloved by all with whom he has associated. He comes from my home town, Hastings, Mich., and, needless to say, is our foremost citizen. We delight to do him honor. It gives me the greatest pleasure to take this brief moment to pay tribute to this splendid man who for so many years has given his best to the service of our country. [Applause.]

LEAVE TO FILE REPORT

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight to-night to file a report upon the bill (H. R. 5315) to amend the Judicial Code, known as the anti-injunction bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. STEWART, for two days, on account of illness.

Mr. CHASE, for the remainder of the week, on account of illness.

Mr. DISNEY, on account of illness.

Mr. TUCKER, for one week, on account of illness.

Mr. KVALE (at the request of Mr. CHRISTGAU), for the day on account of death in family.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

S. J. Res. 14. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 3, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1932

(Legislative day of Wednesday, March 2, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3514) regulating the use of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 132. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to erect one marker for the graves of 15 Confederate soldiers killed in action and buried in the La Fayette Cemetery at La Fayette, Ga., in lieu of separate markers as now authorized by law;

H. R. 7788. An act authorizing the granting by the Secretary of War of a right of way to the Georgia Highway Department; and

H. R. 8083. An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, and it was signed by the Vice President.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a translation of a cablegram from the presidents of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies of the Dominican Republic, expressing felicitation on the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Cablegram—Translation]

SANTO DOMINGO, February 22, 1932.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C.:

We have the honor to inform you that to-day on the occasion of the bicentennial of George Washington, the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies of the Dominican Republic met as a National Assembly, where were present the honorable President of the Republic, Gen. Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina, the diplomatic corps, and high officials, to offer formal homage of admiration and gratitude to the memory of that illustrious leader of liberty. The president of the Senate and the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, Mr. Schoenfeld, delivered eulogies. The National Assembly, on the happy initiative of the honorable President Trujillo, and faithfully interpreting the sentiments of the Dominican people, expressed the desire that the Republic should associate itself in the most eloquent language to the universal homage which to-day is paid to the founder of the United States of America. His glory is the object of reverence for all humanity.

Saluting with assurances of our highest and most distinguished consideration.

MARIO FERMIN CABRAL,
President of the Senate.
MIGUEL A. ROCA,
President of the Chamber of Deputies.

THE UNION MORTGAGE CO., OF CLEVELAND, OHIO

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I have prepared for submission to the Senate a resolution asking for an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary concerning conduct of the Department of Justice with respect to its failure to prosecute officers of the Union Mortgage Co., of Cleveland, on charges of using the mails to defraud.

On the 10th of January, 1928, the Union Mortgage Co. went into receivership, and the liquidation of its affairs resulted in the loss of several million dollars to more than 20,000 investors in its stocks and bonds. Many of these investors had, within a few months before the receivership, purchased stock in the company, or so-called collateral trust bonds with the company's guaranty, having been induced to do so by the publication and transmission through the mails of financial statements which, it appears, the company's officers must have known to be false and misleading in many respects.

Securities had been sold by this company not only throughout northern Ohio but also in Indiana and Pennsylvania, and as far away as New York and Connecticut, and no doubt also in other States.

Some time after the receivership, and when the extent of the losses of Union Mortgage Co. investors was generally recognized, an investigation of the company's operations was undertaken by the Department of Justice. There is reason to believe that this investigation was carried on with considerable thoroughness and, according to newspaper reports, it cost some $20,000 over a period of two years. The final report of this investigation was submitted during the spring of 1930—only a few weeks before the expiration of the 3-year statute of limitation with respect to the violation of the postal laws which was incident to the mailing of the company's statement of condition as of June 30, 1927, approximately six months before the receivership.

Although several of the company's officers must necessarily have participated in the transactions involving the sales of the company's securities, there was only one indictment returned by the Federal grand jury, that of S. Chester Crobaugh, the president of the company.

Several months after this indictment and after the statute of limitations had run in favor of all other possible defendants, definite efforts were made by Crobaugh's friends to secure the dismissal of the case against him. It is reported that District Attorney Wilfred J. Mahon, of Cleveland, insisted upon proceeding against this defendant. Hon. James R. Garfield visited the Department of Justice in Crobaugh's behalf in the month of March, 1931, and, later in the same month, the case was dismissed upon the order of Assistant Attorney General Nugent Dodds, with the approval of Attorney General Mitchell, but apparently over the protest of District Attorney Mahon.

It was made clear through statements to the press that Mr. Garfield and others had submitted new evidence which convinced the Assistant Attorney General that the indictment of Crobaugh was a mistake on the part of the grand jury and that his trial would be utterly unwarranted and unjust. What the new evidence was the Department of Justice refused to disclose, and so did Mr. Garfield.

Almost immediately after the nolle had been entered in the Federal case an investigation of the allegations of fraud in connection with sales of Union Mortgage Co. securities was undertaken by the prosecuting attorney of Cuyahoga County, Ohio. This investigation was followed by the indictment of Crobaugh and two others by a Cuyahoga County grand jury, and their conviction followed on December 4, 1931.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I was called from the Chamber and unable to return until after the Senator began speaking. At this point I want to inquire if the Crobaugh mentioned by the Senator is the same man or one of the same men indicted by the Federal grand jury and the prosecution of which case had been nolled?

Mr. BULKLEY. Crobaugh was the only man indicted by the Federal grand jury and the nolle of that case is the subject matter of my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is the opinion of those who conducted the prosecution that the Federal Government had a more certain case than any that could be presented by the State of Ohio, in that most of the evidence upon which the conviction was secured in the State court would have been admissible in a Federal prosecution for using the mails to defraud, and in addition to that there was a mass of evidence of fraud extending into other States, which could not be used before the Cuyahoga County jury, though it would have been admissible in a Federal prosecution.
